That any Indian born in the United States, who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and who has abandoned, or may hereafter abandon his tribal relations, shall, on making satisfactory proof of such abandonment, under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, except that the provisions of the eighth section of the said act shall not be held to apply to entries made under this act: Provided, however, That the title to lands acquired by any Indian by virtue hereof shall not be subject to alienation or incumbrance, either by voluntary conveyance or the judgment, decree, or order of any court, and shall be and remain inalienable for a period of five years from the date of the patent issued therefor: Provided, That any such Indian shall be entitled to his distributive share of all annuities, tribal funds, lands, and other property, the same as though he had maintained his tribal relations; and any transfer, alienation, or incumbrance of any interest he may hold or claim by reason of his former tribal relations shall be void.

That in all cases in which Indians have heretofore entered public lands under the homestead law, and have proceeded in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or in which they may hereafter be allowed to so enter under said regulations prior to the promulgation of regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Interior under the first section of this act, and in which the conditions prescribed by law have been or may be complied with, the entries so allowed are hereby confirmed, and patents shall be issued thereon; subject, however, to the restrictions and limitations contained in the first section of this act in regard to alienation and incumbrance.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, adding the words "and to report the same to Congress at its next session."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered 12.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House numbered 27.

A bill (S. No. 1297) to provide for the republication of the first volume of the Patent Office Gazette;

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATLANTA.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3762.

The bill (H. R. No. 3762) to amend the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia, approved February 12, 1873, so that the sum of money authorized to be expended in the construction of the building is fixed at $250,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. Although the House of Representatives have receded from their vote against our amendments to the bounty bill, and thereby passed the bill as I understand, yet I desire to have the conference report agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. My colleague is not here. He made objection to that report being received until it could be received in order.

Mr. LOGAN. It has been reported from the House. I now submit the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The report will be read.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot wait for the expiration of time to allow objection to a conference report being received when it was never before objected to.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes on the bill H. R. No. 3341, a bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses—

That the House recede from its vote non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
H. HAMLIN,
GEORGE E. SPENCER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LEWIS B. GUNCKEL,
JOHN COBURN,
CHARLES A. ELDREDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that that report lie on the table, and call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table, and calls for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not make a bit of difference.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill is passed.

The yeas and nays were taken.

The roll-call having been concluded—

Mr. WEST. Before the vote is announced on this question I desire to know whether it is in order to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nothing is in order until the vote is announced.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Chandler, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, and Stewart—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Scott, Spencer, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Fenton, Gordon, Howe, Lewis, Ramsey, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Washburn—19.

So the report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEST. I now make this inquiry. This was a House bill. It came to the Senate and was amended. It went back to the House and the House refused to concur in the amendments. It was then submitted to a commitee of conference. Upon that conference report the House receded from its non-concurrence and has concurred. I would like to ask the Chair in what condition does that leave the bill in this body?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would inform the Senator that the Chair does not feel called upon to answer any parliamentary inquiries as to matters not before the body.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the committee of conference lies on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And has not been accepted.

LANDS AT VINCENNES.

Mr. MORTON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3399.

The bill (H. R. No. 3399) authorizing the sale of certain lands at Vincennes, Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Private Land Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out in lines 7 and 8 the words "as in other sales of public lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to unanimously:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due and hereby are tendered to the Hon. HENRY WILSON, Vice-President of the United States, for the courtesy, impartiality, and ability with which he has presided over their deliberations.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN ATLANTA.

Mr. GORDON. By an inadvertence we passed a while ago the wrong bill. I ask that the bill I now send up be substituted therefor.

The bill (H. R. No. 4685) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use his discretion in the selection of material for the construction of a public building at Atlanta, Georgia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LIMIT LANDS.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the consideration of House bill No. 2502, reported unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 2502) for the relief of settlers on lands within railroads limits was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that where any person or persons who shall have paid for any lands situate within the limits of any grant of lands by Congress to aid in the construction of any railroad, the price of such lands being fixed by law at double-minimum rates, and such lands having been forfeited to the United States for failure to build such railroad, such person or persons shall have the right to locate on any unoccupied lands an amount equal to their original entry without further cost, except such fees as are now provided by law in pre-emption cases, but when such location is upon double-minimum lands, one-half the amount only shall be taken.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 831) for the relief of D. R. Haggard, of Kentucky.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

ENROLLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed sundry enrolled bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will state the question of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the message from the House of Representatives being read so that we may know what enrolled bills are signed by the Speaker.

Mr. SARGENT. Let me make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to know this now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the titles of the enrolled bills sent from the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to all points of order; if the Senate is willing that the Senator from California may make his report I make no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator yields to me to make a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report from the committee of conference will be read.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Secretary read the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses the following:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 9, 13, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 34, 35, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 56, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 80, 83, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 93, 112, 113, and 115.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 8, 15, 21, 31, 44, 53, 57, 60, 66, 82, 85, 97, 98, 100, 102, 103, 106, 107, 108, 109, 114, 119, and 122; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreememt to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "and" where it occurs in line 26, page 3 of the bill, and insert after the word "refuge" in line 27, same page, "and sites for beacons;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out after the word "purposes" in line 3 down to and including the word "thousand" in line 4, and inserting in lieu thereof "185,000;" and striking out all of the proviso down to and including the word "specified" in line 18 of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from it disagreement to the amendment numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "claims" in said amendment insert "of the Senate;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Substitute for the word "seventy-five" the word "sixty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same by inserting after the words "Yerba Buena" the word "island;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 40, with an amendment substituting for the words proposed to be stricken out the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a careful examination to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether any person, firm, or corporation is now occupying any larger portion of the land known as the Rancho Panoche Grande than is authorized and allowed by the laws relating to mining lands, and that he make a full and detailed report of such examination to Congress at the beginning of the next session; and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect this provision, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 42, and agree to the same by substituting for the words proposed to be inserted the word "seventy-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the word "forty" for "twenty" in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from so much of its amendment as strikes out section 2 of the bill, with an amendment striking out all after the word "dollars" in lines 57 to 73 of the bill down to and including the word "six," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "two chiefs of divisions, at $2,400 each; two clerks of class four; five clerks of class three;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 124, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the word "copies" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one copy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

AARON A. SARGENT,
STEPHEN W. DORSEY,
JAMES K. KELLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont still insist on his call for the reading of the enrolled bills signed by the Speaker of the House?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be reported by the Clerk.

The SECRETARY. The following enrolled bills have been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

A bill (H. R. No. 4801) granting a pension to Micajah Stout;

A bill (H. R. No. 4771) granting a pension to Charles A. Draher;

A bill (H. R. No. 1606) granting a pension to Stephen Weatherlow;

A bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey;

A bill (H. R. No. 3713) granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper;
A bill (H. R. No. 4775) granting a pension to Margaret Pattison;
A bill (H. R. No. 4754) granting a pension to Betsey A. Eaton;
A bill (H. R. No. 4777) granting a pension to James A. Forgey;
A bill (H. R. No. 4800) granting a pension to John H. Looby;
A bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position in the Navy;
A bill (H. R. No. 4329) granting a pension to William H. Small;
A bill (H. R. No. 965) granting a pension to Samuel Purcell:
A bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of the late Commodore Melancthon B. Woolsey, of the Navy;
A bill (H. R. No. 4776) granting a pension to Elizabeth Lanning;
A bill (H. R. No. 4769) granting a pension to Abraanna L. Dunn;
A bill (H. R. No. 3718) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Arthur;
A bill (H. R. No. 4763) granting a pension to Lafayette Briggs;
A bill (H. R. No. 4767) for the relief of Ferdinand Monti; and
A bill (H. R. No. 4755) granting a pension to William Lyon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT signed these enrolled bills.

PETERS & READ.

Mr. NORWOOD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 565.

The bill (H. R. No. 565) for the relief of Peters & Reed, naval contractors at the Norfolk navy-yard in the year 1860, was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the report in that case. This bill appropriates a large sum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will proceed to read the report in the case.

Mr. MORTON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3176.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a bill pending which was taken up on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the circumstances I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. MARSH.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move to take up from the table the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to reconsider the vote whereby the bill (H. R. No. 3170) for the relief of John W. Marsh was postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up House bill No. 3176.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I believe the Senator from Indiana has already had the floor on one bill, and I claim the right.

Mr. MORTON. I do not often trouble the Senate. I hope I shall be allowed to have this bill disposed of.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I raise the question that under the agreement the Senator from Indiana has already had the floor to pass one bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide questions of agreement between Senators.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I appeal to the Senator from Indiana. I ask for the decision of the Chair on the question I raise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair declines to decide a question of courtesy between Senators.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Vermont awhile ago had the floor and passed a dozen bills.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That was under special agreement.

Mr. PRATT. It is House bill No. 3176 that my colleague wishes to have considered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I shall object to the bill unless I have my rights.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk cannot find the bill called for by the Senator from Indiana just at present.

ROADS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. JONES. I ask leave to take up House bill No. 2419.

The bill (H. R. No. 2419) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $15,000, to be used, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in the construction of military roads in the Territory of Arizona, from Fort Whipple to Camp McDowell, with a branch to Camp Verde; and from Fort Whipple to Skull Valley direct.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOWELL A. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask for the consideration of joint resolution No. 102.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlain was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the President to restore Lowell A. Chamberlain to his position in the First Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, with the same rank and date of commission, and without forfeiture of pay, as if he had not tendered his resignation, if the President shall be convinced, upon an examination of the evidence in the case, that the dismissal of the said Chamberlain by sentence of the general court-martial before which he was tried would have been unjust and not warranted by the facts. No vacancy which may hereafter occur in the grade of first lieutenant in the First Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, is to be filled until the number of officers in that grade in the regiment shall be reduced to the number now allowed by law.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1310.

The bill (S. No. 1310) providing for the extension of the time for completing the survey and location of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the time for the completion of the survey and location of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and branches two years from the 14th day of April, 1875.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL REPORTS FOR 1872 AND 1873.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing reported some time since a resolution of the House of Representatives to print additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and reported it without recommendation, because there was no mode of distributing documents. The mode has now been provided, and members and Senators have desired that there might be a vote on the resolution. If it will cause no debate I will call it up.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1872, two hundred and thirty thousand copies, of which fifty thousand shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and eighty thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and that there be printed of the report of the said Commissioner for the year 1873 one hundred and fifty-five thousand copies, of which thirty-five thousand copies shall be for the use of the Senate and one hundred and twenty thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Evidently this cannot pass without considerable debate. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope we may have an opportunity to vote upon it. It is now too late for debate. There has been provided a means by which these reports can be circulated. Let us have a vote. If the Senate do not want them, they can vote down the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I trust it will not be acted on at the present time. This is reintroducing the old system of public documents for distribution by members of Congress. I had supposed we were entirely through with it, but at all events under the arrangement that we made here this morning no business was to be done that was objected to, and I object to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that one objection carries the resolution over.

Mr. SHERMAN. This will undoubtedly give rise to debate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope we may have a vote on the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I appeal to the Senator from New Jersey if there was not an understanding that no business should be transacted this morning except such as was not objected to?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the Chair that such was not the understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island, upon which an amendment is pending which will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to address the Senate briefly upon this subject. This resolution has been pending about two years I believe. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island——

Mr. ANTHONY. We have printed none for two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is to publish a public report of the Commissioner of Agriculture of two years ago.

Mr. ANTHONY. Both the report of two years ago and of one year ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. If you send an agricultural report two years old to a farmer he will not thank you. This provides for the publication of four hundred thousand volumes, most of them reports two years old and some a year old, costing about half a dollar apiece, or $200,000. Is it worth while for us to add to the expiring agonies of this Congress by doing an act so unnecessary, so uncalled for as to spend $200,000 in the publication of documents two years old that were not of much value even when they were new? I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will allow this matter to go over. He cannot pass it without exciting some debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island insist on the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. If it is going to excite debate, I suppose I cannot insist on it. I should like to vote. I do not care whether it is voted up or down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was rejected.

WILLIAM GREEN.

Mr. MORTON. The bill which I wanted taken up has been found. I ask for its consideration.

The bill (H. R. No. 3176) for the relief of William Green was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William Green, surviving partner of the firm of Emison & Green, the sum of $377, for services performed by the firm as mail-messengers in carrying the mails to and from the post-office at the city of Vincennes, in the State of Indiana, from the 1st of July, 1854, to the 6th of September, 1855.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be appointed a committee to consist of two members of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that Congress, having finished its business, is now ready to close its present session by adjournment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. CONKLING and Mr. THURMAN.

S. K. THOMPSON.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 1078.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 1078) for the relief of S. K. Thompson, late second lieutenant in the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of War to amend the record of S. K. Thompson so that he shall appear on the rolls and records of the Army for rank as if he had been continuously in service.

The Committee on Military Affairs proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to appoint S. K. Thompson to the rank of second lieutenant in the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATHANIEL G. SMITH.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I wish to say that by an arrangement this morning Senators were permitted to go to the Calendar and reach bills in their care. Unfortunately I occupied the chair at the time and was deprived of that privilege. Now I ask permission to take up three bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask first for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1206.

The bill (S. No. 1206) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $845 to reimburse Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey, for stamps stolen from the post-office at that place on the night of November 12, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NELSON GREEN.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask the consideration of House bill No. 3611.

The bill (H. R. No. 3611) for the relief of Nelson Green was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Postmaster-General to release Nelson Green, of Bay City, Michigan, a mail contractor on mail-routes numbered 24366, being from Granton to Au Sable, and 24367, from Alpena to Au Sable, in Michigan, from the performance of that service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM CHESTER.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 692.

The bill (S. No. 692) for the relief of William Chester was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officer of the Post-Office Department to credit William Chester, postmaster at Knobnoster, Johnson County, Missouri, with the sum of $329.85 on his account as postmaster, that being the amount of postage-stamps and postal money stolen from that post-office on the 11th day of May, 1872, by the burglarious entry of the building in which the office was kept.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

The bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Livana Ingraham;

The bill (S. No. 679) to establish the boundary line between the State of Arkansas and the Indian country;

The bill (S. No. 763) explaining the intent and meaning of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1855;

The bill (S. No. 841) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry;

The bill (S. No. 917) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the County of Chatham, State of Georgia;

The bill (S. No. 1260) to remove the political disabilities of James M. Quarles, of Nashville, Tennessee; and

The bill (S. No. 1331) to remove the political disabilities of Robert W. Johnson, formerly of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed sundry enrolled bills.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have only one more bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the bounty bill is among those bills that are now proposed to be signed as enrolled bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3341) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

Mr. DAVIS. There is an objection to the signing of that bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have one more bill to call up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I desire to know what has become of the bill just announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) It has been signed by the Vice-President.

Mr. LOGAN. By the Speaker and by the Vice-President.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. What has become of my bill? I want to take up Senate bill No. 927.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. No. 927) for the relief of Thomas Sprinkle, jr.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order. Before that bill was signed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will state the question of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That the bounty bill was submitted to a conference committee and that it reported it, and its report was laid upon the table.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I desire to have my bill sent to the other House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I raise the question of order that this bill having been submitted to a conference committee and reported back here and the report laid on the table, the Vice-President cannot legally sign the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves the consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. What has become of my question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question of order pending before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I raise the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain a question of order in regard to what is not under consideration.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Then I ask for the consideration of the bill called up by me.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not the bill before you? Is it not under consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not before the Chair.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from West Virginia is mistaken. My bill is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to enter a protest. I called when the bill was read against any further proceedings on that bill, because the report of the conference committee was laid on the table.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I rose to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The point of order is that the point of the Senator from Vermont has been decided by the Chair, and unless there be an appeal from the decision there is no question before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I think there is a question of order. I have stated that I desired to enter a protest against the signing of the bounty bill or any proceedings on it from the fact that the conference committee's report was laid on the table and it now belongs to the Senate. I wish that entered.

THOMAS SPRINKLE, JR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill called for by the Senator from Michigan.

The bill (S. No. 927) for the relief of Thomas Sprinkle, jr., was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Postmaster-General is directed by the bill to relieve Thomas Sprinkle, jr., from the obligations of his bid made to the Post-Office Department, January 16, 1874, for carrying the mails of the United States on post-route No. 22165, from Cannelton to Foster's Ridge, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report with that bill?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. There is.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, on the 12th of June, 1874:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Sprinkle, jr., of Oil Creek, Indiana, report:

That said petitioner is the accepted bidder for carrying the mail on route No. 22165, from Cannelton to Foster's Ridge, in said State, at an annual compensation of $130. He claims that he cannot read or write, and that his bid was filled up by Robert W. Reily, who by mistake made it $130 per annum, instead of $230 as instructed; and in proof thereof has filed affidavits of himself, said Robert W. Reily, and Mary C. Reily, postmaster at Oil Creek, who certified to the sufficiency of the guarantors, all going to show that the bid as filled up and accepted was an error. On account of said mistake, he asks to be released from said bid. The Postmaster-General, in a letter dated May 4, 1874, says that he is well satisfied of the truthfulness of petitioner's statements, but that the Department has no authority to release a bidder under such circumstances, and recommends that petitioner be released by a joint resolution of Congress.

Your committee, therefore, favor the release of said bidder by the accompanying bill, the passage of which they recommend.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senator from New York withdraws his objection. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I thank the Senate for its courtesy. I am through.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta or their legal representatives.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 976) to promote economy and efficiency in the marine hospital service;

A bill (S. No. 757) to devote a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school district No. 1, in township of Sault Sainte Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes;

A bill (S. No. 831) for the relief of D. R. Haggard, of Kentucky; and

A bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of M. Von EntressFuersteneck, late second lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers.

ASBURY DICKINS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to dispose of the motion to reconsider the bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was passed and a motion was entered to reconsider. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] entered the motion to reconsider, but he is not in his place.

Mr. MITCHELL. He was here a moment ago. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania has been demanding the attention of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair twice asked the Senator from Pennsylvania if he desired the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. I desired to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill which is now called up is one which has heretofore elicited considerable debate. The Senate divided upon it and it was carried by a small majority. A motion to reconsider was made, and it ought not to be called up and passed in these closing moments of the session. Now I desire, however, nothing more than that the yeas and nays shall be called upon the motion in regard to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on laying on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. SCOTT called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. If we can have a moment's silence in the Chamber——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be glad to have a moment's silence.

Mr. HOWE. I will help the Chair to produce that. If the Senate will understand what the question submitted is, I think they will order the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins was passed. The Chair will put the question on seconding the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and on being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Eaton, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, and West—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Schurz, Scott, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Carpenter, Conkling, Edmunds, Hamlin, Harvey, Jones, Lewis, Sargent, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and Windom—13.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 815) for the relief of Almont Barnes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4869) to pay the telegraph operators of the Senate and House of Representatives.

TELEGRAPH OPERATORS.

Mr. FENTON. I hope the bill in regard to telegraph operators will be passed at once.

The bill (H. R. No. 4869) to pay the telegraph operators of the Senate and House of Representatives was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is already in the deficiency bill, I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the second reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The other bill I think there will be no objection to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That twenty-five thousand copies of the last report of the Commissioner of Agriculture be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

This is for the Commissioner, not for distribution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

The bill (H. R. No. 4786) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah B. Howe and Mrs. Mary Cranston;

A bill (H. R. No. 4573) to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin; and
A bill (H. R. No. 2502) for the relief of settlers on lands within railroad limits.

ALMONT BARNES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now ask for the consideration of the House bill on the table for the relief of Almont Barnes.
The bill (H. R. No. 815) for the relief of Almont Barnes was read.
Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is a bill to pay a clerk of the House about $500, and they tell me at the House it is all right. That is all I know about it.
Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.
The bill was read three times, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, it Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and apprise him of the readiness of the two Houses to adjourn has discharged its duty, and have been informed by the President that he has no further communication to make.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the second session of the Forty-third Congress is terminated, and the Chair declares the Senate adjourned without day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1875.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D., as follows:

Great God, our Father and the sovereign of all worlds, we draw nigh to Thee in these closing hours, and ask Thee to control these Thy servants in judgment, that they may be preserved from that which is wrong; to inspire them with courage of heart to meet all their responsibilities; that Thy spirit may so govern that all that shall be done to-day may be in accordance with Thy will.

We draw nigh asking a Father's blessing. We thank Thee for life preserved during these months and years. O Lord, we pray Thee blot out all our transgressions, and fill us with charity toward each other. Wherein we have sinned against Thee, do Thou forgive; wherein we have sinned against each other, O that Thy Spirit may animate us!

We ask Thy blessing, O Lord, upon us as in Thy providence we shall be separated. Make each life a center of hallowed influences; make us true and faithful in every position that God may call us to fill, that we may have peace now and peace at the last. We commit and commend to Thee, O God, the interests of this great Government. Thou hast ever raised up true and faithful men. We know that to Thy hand we may trustingly commit all in the future as in the past. Be Thou our King, our Shepherd, our Saviour, and our Friend. Blot out everything offensive in Thy sight, and grant us a Father's blessing.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil: For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

M'CRARY'S LAW OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to procure from the publisher thereof four hundred copies of The American Law of Elections, by Hon. GEORGE W. MCCRARY, for the use of the House, to be kept for that purpose, at a cost not to exceed five dollars per volume, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

E. MILLER, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 878 authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Passed Assistant Paymaster E. Miller, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I object to everything but the regular order, and I will state my reason for it. I wish to get the deficiency appropriation bill through, so it may be sent to the Senate at once. All these matters can come in afterward. It is of the utmost importance that the deficiency bill should be sent to the Senate at the earliest possible moment.

REPORT ON FISHERIES.

Mr. DONNAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit the following report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) There be printed four thousand additional copies of the third report of Professor Spencer F. Baird, Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, with the accompanying documents; of which one thousand copies shall be for the use of the Senate, twenty-five hundred for the use of the House of Representatives, and five hundred for the use of the Commissioner.

Mr. DONNAN. This changes the original resolution referred to the Committee on Printing only in reducing the number of copies ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEAL ISLANDS OF ALASKA.

Mr. DONNAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) There be printed of Henry W. Elliott's report on the seal islands of Alaska, with illustrations, twenty-five hundred extra copies; of which five hundred shall be for the use of the Senate, fifteen hundred for the use of the House of Representatives, and five hundred for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. DONNAN. This also changes the resolution referred to the Committee on Printing only in reducing the number of copies ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now take the floor for the purpose of moving the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and continue the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would say to the House that while I am not prepared at this moment to submit a report from the committee of conference on the legislative bill, yet it is important that report should be made at the earliest practicable moment, and I therefore suggest before we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union that when the action of the Senate on that conference report is made the committee shall immediately rise to consider and act on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will help the gentleman in that. I believe with him it is important that report should be acted on at the earliest moment. I now insist on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency bill.

Mr. MYERS. There are some small matters upon the table which ought first to be attended to. It will not take long, and we then can go into committee on the deficiency bill.

Mr. RANDALL. That can be attended to afterward as well as now. If the House should neglect to send the deficiency appropriation bill over to the Senate it will be a source of the greatest embarrassment, and this House will be responsible for the failure to pass necessary legislation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are some small bills which it is necessary to pass, and they ought to be passed at this time, in order they may be sent to the proper officers for engrossment. They will not delay the passage of the appropriation bill at all. On the contrary if we pass these bills now we will save a great deal of time.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4829) for the relief of the Willow Springs Distillery Company of Omaha, Nebraska; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army.

THOMAS M. JONES.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 523) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas M. Jones, of Virginia, and put it upon its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is it accompanied with a petition?

Mr. HUNTON. It is.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, and accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds agreeing thereto.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and the Clerk will read the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia due from the United States, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $77,765.86.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I raised the point of order on the preceding paragraph in the bill last evening, and I do not think the Chair has fully understood my point. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated what these items were.

I then read from the statutes showing that each one of the items in this clause, as stated by the chairman, was by the positive law of last winter to be paid by the District of Columbia; that therefore it was out of order in this bill to insert an appropriation to pay them out of the Treasury. It is true that the clause as printed in the bill does not show the items; but the chairman of the committee stated the items, each one of which is payable by law specifically out of the funds of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this action of the commissioners was under the authority conferred upon them as agents of the Government, they acting in an official capacity, and having authority by the law under which they were appointed to make these expenditures. The Chair therefore does not think the point well taken.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The statute expressly says that these expenses shall be paid from the funds of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must overrule the point.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move then to amend by striking out the paragraph, and inserting the following:

On account of salaries of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to January 1, 1875	$7,528 66
On account of salaries of assistant engineers to January 1, 1875	1,736 16
On account of expenses of the board of audit, including salaries of the clerks, &c., to January 1, 1875	25,486 63
On account of printing and trimming 3.65 bonds, act June 20	11,451 25
Total amount	46,202 70

Here in these two paragraphs are items amounting to over $100,000 which I say should not be paid by the Government of the United States, if the items intended to be covered are those embraced in the statement I have sent up.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman has sent up the items on page 32 of our printed report, they are.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The gentleman then admits that I have sent up the items embraced in this paragraph; and every one of those items the District of Columbia is bound by law to pay. We have already appropriated $1,700,000 for the expenses of this District for the present year; and here is another appropriation of $100,000 for payments which this Government is not bound in reason or justice to meet. The appropriation is contrary to existing law, and I protest against it. Of course, if the House sees fit to put it through and give the District of Columbia all that is asked here, I can do no more than object. But in the name of the tax-payers of this country I do protest against throwing money away in this manner.

Mr. MERRIAM. To assuage the grief of my patriotic friend from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] permit me to say that after years of earnest warfare against the unlimited appropriations from the Treasury for this District, I have given up in despair and made up my mind that a frog might as well attempt to buffet the Falls of Niagara as a few of us to buffet the current flowing out from the Treasury to make glad the District of Columbia; for so long as a majority of our public men own property in the District our efforts against the outflow are powerless. If we succeed in striking out an item here and there of a hundred thousand dollars, they are sure to travel to the statute books under the manipulations of the "necessity of compromises" in conference committees. Besides all direct appropriations, the District debt is equivalent to a $90,000 mortgage upon each congressional district in the United States; for who doubts but that the people of the whole country must eventually pay this debt, provided the people do not insist upon a change of the present policy.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire merely to say that the President, in pursuance of the law of Congress, has appointed a board of commissioners for the District—men whom I believe Congress and the country trust. Those commissioners have reported in detail a class of items belonging to the year now passing, which they claim are properly payable by the United States. I confess that I have not gone down into these details myself so as to say that I know from the bottom that all the specific expenditures are proper charges against the United States. But we must trust somebody; and when Governor Dennison and the other two commissioners put themselves on record officially, declaring that these charges have been paid on behalf of the United States; that there was no appropriation to pay them; that they diverted enough District funds in their hands to pay them, and now ask the Government to reimburse them, there is propriety in appropriating this money. It seems to me we ought to trust somebody. And the general cry that we are paying too much for this District, while it may be true as a general proposition, does not answer the request of these gentlemen. I will have printed as a part of my remarks a letter of the commissioners, and ask the committee to come to a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know why we have to pay this.

Mr. GARFIELD. The only reason I know is the reason stated in the letter of the commissioners, and the communication inclosed therein from the board of audit.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the letter read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Clerk to read the letter. Let me first state that the board of audit, as gentlemen are aware, consists of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, the Second Comptroller, and one other officer of the Treasury. They were appointed to this very business by the Government of the United States. We have wiped out the government of the District of Columbia. Up to last June the District had a government with a Legislature of its own, that taxed its own people, that appropriated money out of its own treasury, that conducted its own business. Congress, in its supreme and paramount right to do so, abolished that government, and the District has now no government except such as Congress itself creates by its own law. Congress has created a government consisting of three officers appointed by the President, salaried by Congress, and acting under the laws of Congress, and those officers report a deficiency, and there is their report.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the letter first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1875.

DEAR SIR: The commissioners of the District hand you herewith a communication addressed to them by the auditor of the District, showing the amount of $46,202.70 paid by them from the treasury of the District, which we respectfully ask Congress to refund to the District.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives United States.

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 19, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: In reply to your inquiry I have the honor to inform you that the records of this office show that there has been audited and paid—

On account of salaries of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to January 1, 1875	$7,258 66
On account of salaries of assistant engineers to January 1, 1875	1,736 16
On account of expenses of the board of audit, including salaries of the clerks, &c., to January 1, 1875	25,486 63
On account of printing and trimming 3.65 bonds, act June 20	11,451 25
Total amount audited and paid as above	46,202 70

The salaries of the members of the board of audit are not included in the above sum.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. VINSON,
Auditor District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. Twenty-five thousand dollars of this amount has been paid to the board of audit?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; that has been paid on account of expenses of the board of audit, including salaries of clerks, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. Has there ever been anything else appropriated for the board of audit?

Mr. GARFIELD. Nothing at all?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, whether by a law of last winter the expenses of the board of audit were not to be paid by the District of Columbia?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no recollection of that law at all.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to say that so far as I am concerned I shall make no further attempt to prevent anything going through that is proposed. I shall only make this single remark, that, in my opinion there are too many upon this floor and upon committees who have an interest in real property in this District.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order, and insist that order shall be maintained in the committee. I see only the swinging of the gentlemen's hands.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If the gentleman will take his seat I will make my remarks.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We can hear none of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I was saying that, in my opinion, there are too many men on this floor who have an interest in real property in this District.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the gentleman to order. That is a reflection which should not be made here.

Mr. COTTON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not see any occasion for questioning the necessary appropriations for this District. We have decided to levy upon the people of this District a certain rate of taxation at 1½ per cent.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that order be preserved in the committee.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think it is the duty of the officers of this House to see that there is less noise and disturbance in the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the officers of the House to aid in preserving order. It is impossible for business to proceed while gentlemen persist in carrying on conversation in the rear of the seats.

Mr. COTTON. I was saying that we had passed a tax bill fixing the rate of taxation at 1½ per cent. on the property of the District. Now Congress understands that beyond what is raised by that tax the remainder of the money necessary to pay the interest on the bonds of this District, and to pay its current expenses, must be made up by appropriations. Whether the appropriation is made for this or for another purpose is wholly immaterial, because Congress in the end must make up and must pay all the expenses over and above the proceeds of the tax we have decided to levy.

The question was on agreeing to Mr. LOUGHRIDGE'S amendment; which was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that. It is merely itemizing the amount. Let it be adopted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the amount is the same as in the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is. It only itemizes the account.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this clause intended to cover those items, no more and no less?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; no more and no less.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the prevailing confusion it has been impossible to hear the amendment, and I ask that it be again reported.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. These items ought to be chargeable to the people of the District of Columbia, and ought not to be appropriated for out of the Treasury. I shall have to ask a division on the adoption of a proposition of that character. It inaugurates the policy of charging all these items to the national Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa not to move to strike out all the words of the paragraph. Strike out all after the word "them" in line 73 and insert "that," and then it will be all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I suggest that the gentleman insert it after the word "them" in line 71 so as to strike out the words "on behalf of the United States from the treasury of the District to be expended by them."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that; and then the rest of the paragraph must be stricken out. I will state that it only itemizes this amount and does not change it; that is all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa containing the items was rejected by the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, it was not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I raise the question of order that two amendments are now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, as modified at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to strike out the paragraph as it stands amended.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 21, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia due from the United States, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $77,765.86.

Mr. STORM. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of that paragraph:

The sum of $13,312.71, to pay for the property destroyed by the board of health of the District of Columbia to prevent the spread of contagious diseases.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. That there is no law authorizing any such appropriation.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if that item is not included in the sum already appropriated?

Mr. STORM. I wish to say that during the prevalence of the small-pox in 1872 and 1873 the board of health of this District destroyed a large amount of property and gave receipts to the owners of the property, promising to pay for it. They made the excuse for a year or two that the District Legislature had made no appropriation to pay for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STORM. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question; and that is, whether any portion of this item is intended to pay for the property destroyed by the board of health?

Mr. GARFIELD. A part of it is for that very purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make the point of order on the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make the point of order now.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in violation of law.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph, and it is to strike out the words "the portion of" and also the words "due from the United States."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is right.

Mr. THOMPSON. The paragraph will then read, "to pay the general expenses of the District of Columbia, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $77,765.86."

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I suggest to the gentleman to leave in the words "portion of the general expenses" and to change "the" to "a;" so that it will read, "to pay a portion of the general expenses," &c.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will modify my amendment to that extent.

Mr. HOLMAN. My motion to strike out the paragraph I suppose is to be decided last. If it is not desirable to further amend it——

Mr. CHIPMAN. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] proposes to make the same amendment to this as to the last paragraph, to itemize it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It cannot possibly be itemized so as to change its objectionable character. The attempt, by any form of expression or by the use of any words, to pass an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States to pay the indebtedness of this District, seems to me to be a thing which even in the last moments of this session might attract the attention of the members of this House. I regret very much that my colleague [Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana] should move to strike out the words "due from the United States," for that presents this matter in all its objectionable aspects. He knows very well that it is the purpose of those who are in charge of this bill to establish a precedent for charging against the National Treasury a debt of a purely local character, which should be borne by the citizens and the property of this District. I for one protest against it.

I cannot understand the motive of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] in bringing in such a provision in this bill. You are swelling the charges against the people of this country to the extent of $2,000,000 for the purely local expenditures of this District, on indebtedness with which the people of the United States have nothing to do. The people of my district and of my colleague's district have no more responsibility in equity, law, or justice for the payment of these debts than for the debts of any other citizens in this country. For one I protest against the inauguration of this policy during the closing hours of this Congress, and the establishment of a precedent by which it will be claimed in future that Congress has committed itself to the policy of paying the local indebtedness and expenditures of this District.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that all good angels will give grace enough to any man who may hereafter have charge of the appropriation bills to enable him to endure the aspersion of his motives, constantly made by gentlemen who make such speeches as have been made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and others who have spoken this morning. They desire to know "what motive the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can have in reporting an appropriation bill like this." And another gentleman suggested that there were too many men on this floor who own real estate in this District, and who are in favor of legislation that would aid themselves so far as the payment of taxes is concerned.

Now, to all this small, miserable, unmanly talk I make this reply: that we have swept away the government of this District, by which the people here were enabled to govern themselves. We have, by the supreme power of Congress, put in the place of their own officers our own commissioners, honest and trusted men, and those commissioners have sent to this Congress a communication asking Congress for $77,000, and they give the items of the account. One of those items is for $13,000, which our own officers, our board of health, expended while the small-pox was raging here, at a time when a member of the family of one of our own number died of small-pox. They spent this sum to protect us and all in the city from the ravages of the small-pox. That board of health destroyed private property and infected clothing to the extent of $13,000 to stay the further progress of the plague. That is one item which these honored commissioners very properly ask us to enable them to pay.

And yet when this is done gentlemen arise and ask to know "What motive the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can have in reporting such a proposition?" And another argument is made here that somebody owns a little house and lot where his family resides, and therefore he has a mercenary motive to seek to protect himself against tax by this bill of ours. I hope I may never get down so low, that I may never fling vitriol and poison around me on my fellow-members in that way, and talk about motives in the discharge of a public and honorable duty. I call attention to the letter of the commissioners of the District on this subject:

The communication was as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to transmit herewith a list of claims for services rendered to the late District government and board of public works, amounting to $28,619.68, for the payment of which I think some provision ought to be made. The appointments in the majority of the cases under which these services were rendered were in my opinion irregular, and in others, although the appointments were regular, the services were extended beyond the time limited by law, and for these reasons I did not consider I was authorized to audit the claims. In all of these cases, however, it appears the services were actually rendered in good faith; that the rate of compensation charged for the services is reasonable and just, and believing that the proper conduct of the public business required their services, I make the present recommendation.

In addition to these claims, there have been filed in this office other claims, principally for extra services rendered, amounting to $14,406.76, which I submit, with the several vouchers therefor, without recommendation, for such action as you may think proper.

The records of this office show there are audited bills of the fire department for the years 1871 and 1872 on which 50 per cent. has been paid, leaving a balance unpaid of	$5,913 16
Also unaudited bills of the fire department for 1872, 1873, and 1874, prior to June 30, 1874, on which nothing has been paid	3,120 01
Total deficiency in fire department for the payment of which provision should be made	9,033 17
The Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia appropriated by act approved June 26, 1873, for the board of health, the sum of	25,000 00
Of this sum there has been audited and paid	11,687 29
Leaving balance unpaid	13,312 71

The board of health are asking for the payment of this balance to enable them to discharge liabilities incurred by them during the prevalence of the small-pox on the faith of this appropriation. Some provision ought, in my judgment, to be made for its payment.

The estimated expenditures for the board of audit from January 1, 1875, to June 30, 1875, including salaries of the members, clerks, &c., are $25,000, which sum was not included in the commissioners' estimate of expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. This amount will also have to be provided for.

The salaries of the assistant engineers from January 1, 1875, to June 30, 1875, will amount to $1,800.

The total amount for which it is recommended that congressional appropriation be asked (as above) is $77,765.56.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. VINSON,
Auditor District of Columbia.

Hon. COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

WM. TINDALL,
Secretary to the Commissioners District of Columbia.

FEBRUARY 4, 1875.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1875.

DEAR SIR: The commissioners of the District hand you herewith a communication addressed to them by the auditor of the District, to which they respectfully invite your attention, in the hope that your committee will recommend to Congress the making the appropriation of $77,765.86 for the purposes set forth in said communication.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

HON. J. A. GARFIELD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives United States.

Official copy.

WM. TINDALL,
Secretary.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. My colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] states that his constituents have no interest in this city, and that mine have none. I do not so conceive the interests of the people of this country. I believe that the people in my district and the people in my colleague's district are interested in the capital of this nation.

We have levied a tax of 1½ per cent. upon the property, real and personal, in this District. We have tried to go upon the theory that the people of this District shall be taxed substantially as are the people of other districts and cities of like size throughout the country. So far there is justice; beyond that is oppression.

This city is laid out on a scale and plan upon which no other city in this country is laid out. A vast amount of expense is created here by the United States. It is the seat of Government, and I ask whether it is a vicious proposition, as it is characterized here, that the Government shall pay some proportion of the additional expense that falls upon the municipal government here because of the seat of the National Government being located here? These expenses are necessary to be incurred and paid; they are necessary for the well-being of this city; and whatever is necessary for the well-being of this city is necessary for the well-being of my colleague's constituents and of mine.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my colleague mention any city in Indiana where the whole tax—State, corporation, &c.—does not exceed 1½ per cent.?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I cannot name any such city in the State of Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can my colleague name any city in that State where the tax is less than 2½ per cent.?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I will say this: that while I know of no city in Indiana where the tax is less than 2½ per cent. altogether, yet it must be borne in mind that our cities are taxed for the purpose of carrying on the State government with its State machinery, while here there is no State machinery. I simply ask that these people within the scope of their governing power, within the limits of their privileges, shall be put upon an equality with the people of my own town; that they shall not be any further exempted, and shall not bear any greater burden.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is my friend willing to concede that while the people of Indiana pay 1 per cent. more of taxation than is paid in this District, yet the Federal Government must constantly come forward to assume expenses which should properly fall upon the District itself?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I decline to yield further. I will say that I do not understand this 1½ per cent. to be an exact measurement; I suppose that it is merely a step in the line of fixing a policy between this District and the General Government.

Mr. RANDALL. The tax of 1½ per cent. was fixed here yesterday in view of the fact that last year property in this District paid 5 per cent. taxation; that within the past two years the average tax has been 3¾ per cent.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. That is a mitigating circumstance.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly; it was for that reason that we made the rate of taxation 1½ per cent. Many gentlemen of this House stated that they were governed by that consideration, and that if this rate was not found equitable as between the General Government and the property holders here, we would next year raise the rate to 2½ per cent.

Mr. MERRIAM. I hope the gentleman will see that it is done.

The pending pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I renew the amendment. I ask the House to pass over this paragraph informally so that we may hereafter return to it and that I may offer an amendment reaching a purpose that I will explain to the committee.

Yesterday we passed a bill levying the tax which has just been alluded to. That bill contained a provision that as to the payment of the 3 per cent. tax the time should be extended from March until June; but there was no provision with reference to delinquent taxes anterior to that tax. When that bill was draughted the commissioners supposed that they would be ready to make the necessary advertisements for the sale of property for these anterior delinquent taxes within the time required by law. But this morning one of the commissioners has called upon me and stated that they have ascertained that, with all the force they can possibly work, it will be impossible for them to make within the time required by law the necessary advertisements for the sale of property for these anterior delinquent taxes; that it is therefore necessary for Congress to take some action on that subject; otherwise those taxes may be lost.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me suggest that if any delay is made with reference to delinquent taxes prior to the 3 per cent. levy, the sales of all ought to be made at the same time. We have already extended the time with reference to the 3 per cent. tax, and it would be desirable that the sale for that tax and the other delinquent taxes should take place at the same time.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If the House will pass over this paragraph informally, my purpose is to draught as soon as I can an amendment making a provision of that character. The purpose is to enable the District authorities to collect these taxes that the people ought to pay, and not allow them to lapse for want of time.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can offer such a provision as an additional section at the end of the bill; and if it should then be thought proper to have it inserted here, consent will no doubt be given.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to reduce the amount $1,000.

I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of submitting a few remarks on this subject generally. One of the first things which impressed me when I came to Congress some years ago was the utter neglect on the part of Congress to take that care of the District of Columbia which the Constitution, as I thought and still believe, required us to do. We govern this District just as a Legislature of a State governs a State. There is no other legislative power here but that imposed by the Constitution of the United States upon Congress.

I found, on inquiry into the condition of the laws of the District, that many of the old Maryland statutes which are out of date and absurd as applicable to the present condition of things, were still in force under a general law of Congress adopting and extending them over this District. I commenced calling attention to this subject by offering a resolution instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill for the election of a Delegate to represent this District in the House of Representatives. I think I had the honor of first proposing that measure in this way many years ago. I followed it consistently until a Delegate was ultimately provided for; but there was coupled with it a provision for such universal and indiscriminate suffrage as seems to have brought the whole subject of District matters, including the provision for Delegate, into disrepute, and finally resulted in abolishing the office of Delegate.

I wish to say this much; that, in my judgment, we have been derelict in our duty toward this District in very many respects, and especially in one particular, and that is in not providing years ago some arrangement by which it shall be understood exactly how much the General Government ought to pay out of the general Treasury, and how much the property here ought to pay in local taxes for the support of the government of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to say in addition that one of the very few regrets I have in quitting Congress, as I shall do in a few hours, is that I have to leave this whole question of the relations of the Government to the District of Columbia in an unsettled and very unsatisfactory condition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the proposition.

Now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] grows sensitive over the inquiry, what motive could induce him to bring forward as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations measure after measure seeking to charge against the whole people of this country debts properly and legitimately belonging to the citizens of this District? He becomes quite indignant, and seems to repel the idea that any other than the highest sense of duty impels him in his course of policy. Now the gentleman must remember that this is only the outcropping of a policy which he has supported from the very beginning. He must remember that the passage of the act of 1871, by which the plain, simple corporation of Washington was abolished and a District government established, extravagant, profligate in its conception, was the source of all these troubles. He must remember that during the last hours of the last session he brought forward charges upon the national Treasury to the extent of three and one-quarter millions of dollars for the benefit of gentlemen who are concerned in adding value, specious value, to the real estate of the city of Washington. He will remember that when I sought to impose some limitation on the power of the board of public works, that they should not have unlimited power to impose charges against the Government, he resisted it to the bitter end. Therefore it is not simply now the gentleman brings forward a proposition of this kind, but this is, as I have said, only an outcropping of the policy he has always enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that I have never at any time resisted any proper limitation of the powers granted to the Government in this District, but, on the contrary, have always urged, for myself and in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, that expenditures should be confined within the limit of appropriations. But let us have a vote.

Mr. NIBLACK. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose that every member of the House has at some time or other in his service here been struck with the persistent and unaccountable hostility manifested toward this District of Columbia. I have been utterly unable to divine the motive for this feeling. The motive of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I cannot comprehend. The spirit that controls him I never understood. I have indeed given up trying to divine it. We have taken the District of Columbia and everything that pertains to it absolutely into our hands, as the Constitution probably authorizes us to do. We now determine the rate and mode of its taxation and prescribe the machinery of collecting the taxes. We do this without any representation hereafter of the people and without any voice of theirs in determining any of the questions with relation thereto. The money we compel them to pay goes into the Treasury of the United States and can only be drawn therefrom by our authority and by our agents. Gentlemen complain because we make appropriations for the District, to aid Congress and the Federal Government in conducting and for carrying on its local affairs. If we deprive them of it and insist upon doing it ourselves we ought to pay at least a part of the expenses of the luxury. My friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] says he was the first to propose a delegate representation for the District of Columbia. I do not know but he was, so far as the members of the House are concerned. He appreciated and still appreciates the importance and propriety of representation and taxation going together. It is much easier for any people to pay taxes imposed by themselves than those imposed upon them by others. Any obligation we take upon ourselves we can bear, when, if the same was imposed by others or without our consent, it would be felt an intolerable burden, an act of tyranny and oppression.

Before my friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] was in Congress the District of Columbia and its peculiar relation to the Government became and was the subject of anxious concern to the distinguished statesmen of the country. I have in my hand the message of General Jackson, of December 6, 1830, in which he calls attention to the subject in the true spirit in which I think we should all consider it. I agree with the views he expresses; they have the true ring of democracy and fully accord with the principles of our representative system. I commend them to my democratic friends especially, and to all who desire to do justice to this people:

> Your attention is respectfully invited to the situation of the District of Columbia. Placed by the Constitution under the exclusive jurisdiction and control of Congress, this District is certainly entitled to a much greater share of its consideration than it has yet received. There is a want of uniformity in its laws, and particularly in those of a penal character, which increases the expense of their administration and subjects the people to all the inconveniences which result from the operation of different codes in so small a territory. On the different sides of the Potomac the same offense is punishable in unequal degrees; and the peculiarities of many of the early laws of Maryland and Virginia remain in force, notwithstanding their repugnance in some cases to the improvements which have superseded them in those States.
> Besides a remedy for these evils which is loudly called for, it is respectfully submitted whether a provision authorizing the election of a Delegate to represent the wants of the citizens of this District on the floor of Congress is not due to them and to the character of our Government. No portion of our citizens should be without a practical enjoyment of the principles of freedom; and there is none more important than that which cultivates a proper relation between the governors and the governed. Imperfect as this must be in this case, yet it is believed that it would be greatly improved by a representation in Congress with the same privileges that are allowed to the other Territories of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I am a friend of the District of Columbia. That message of President Jackson meets a full response in my heart. I agree with it to the fullest extent. I want the Government of the United States to do its full duty and pay its full share of the expenses of ruling the people here. I would there could be some means devised by which the people here could enjoy the full and free right of governing themselves. Local self-government is the pride and perfection of our system. It seems to me hardly possible that any people, any community of our people, can enjoy or be said to have the benefit of our constitution of government who are deprived of it. I cannot reconcile myself to the continuation of the government we have established over the people of this District. It violates every principle of republican government; it is no more a democratic government or "a government of the people, by the people," than the worst despotism of history. I cannot but tremble with fear and alarm when I hear such a government advocated or defended. The District committee had provided in the tax-bill prepared and reported by it to this House for the election of a Delegate, as recommended by President Jackson in the message from which I have read. This would have been some small approach toward a representation. It would have provided the people here with a voice on this floor, through whom they could make known their grievances and necessities, their wants and desires; through whom those who tax and rule them could be informed of their situation and condition. It is absolutely impossible that justice can be done toward this people without some one to represent them in this body, that rules and taxes them. I enter here and now my most solemn and earnest protest against the government of any people in this country under our Constitution without representation. I repeat, it is in violation of every principle of our republican system. I demand for this people the right of self-government, the right of "home rule."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WHEELER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and resume the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, and pending that I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and the subject-matter thereof be closed in one minute. I desire to make this suggestion: Gentlemen must see the importance of our getting forward with this bill. I think it would be a very bad precedent indeed if we were compelled to pass an appropriation bill of this miscellaneous sort under a suspension of the rules; and if gentlemen will restrain debate and let us go forward, I think we can get through without resorting to that proceeding.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not think the gentleman's lecture should have been addressed to this side of the House.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was also agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House debate on the pending paragraph is limited to one minute.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It merely itemizes the amount appropriated in this paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the vote be taken on the pending amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment that this paragraph shall be stricken from the bill.

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 15, noes 60; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 116.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At the end of line 78 add the following:
> The same being the following items: For services rendered the late board of public works, $28,619.68. For balance due on bills of fire departments for the years 1871 and 1872, $9,033.17. Balance unpaid, due to board of health from the District of Columbia, by act of said District Legislative Assembly of June 26, 1873, $13,312.71; estimated expenditures of board of audit from January 1, 1875, to June 30, 1875; $25,000; salaries of assistant engineers from January 1, 1875, to June 30, 1875, $1,800. Total, $77,765.86.

Mr. SPEER. Is that a substitute for the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment, to insert these items at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. SPEER. They make no addition to the amount?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The amendment simply gives the items which enter into the amount.

Mr. GARFIELD. In order to save time I hope the amendment will be adopted by unanimous consent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGANS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After line 78 add the following:
> For annual repairs of the Reform School building in the District of Columbia, $1,000.

Mr. HAGANS. I desire just to say a word in explanation. There is no more necessary appropriation in this bill than this.

Mr. GARFIELD, (interrupting.) There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At the end of line 78 add the following:
> To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the persons employed to make the valuation of Government property in the District of Columbia, under section 13 of the act approved December 21, 1871, $2,500: Provided, That no portion of this amount shall be paid except for time actually employed in or about the making of said valuation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any law for that? I make the point of order that it is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. CHIPMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state how that is. The act cited in the amendment reads as follows: After providing for an estimate of the property in the District of Columbia belonging to private individuals there is this proviso:

> That all valuations of property belonging to the United States shall be made by such persons as the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint and under such regulations as he shall prescribe.

In accordance with that provision of law the Secretary of the Interior appointed a commission of five to assess the value of the property of the United States in the District of Columbia.

The Secretary, on the 28th day of January, 1875, addressed to the Speaker of the House the following communication, recommending an appropriation of $3,400:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a letter addressed to me on the 16th instant, by Hallett Kilbourn, Madison Davis, A. A. Hosmer, S. H. Kauffmann, and H. A. Hall, of this city, presenting a claim against the United States for compensation on account of services rendered by them in 1871 and 1872 in appraising the value of the real estate in the District of Columbia belonging to the Government, and of the grounds in said District dedicated to the public use as parks and squares.

In virtue of the authority conferred upon me by section 36 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, (United States Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 426,) the gentlemen above named were appointed by me a board of appraisers to ascertain the value of the property referred to in said section. They were duly qualified before the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia on the 17th day of November, 1871, and completed their labors on the 30th day of March, 1872, on which day their report was prepared and transmitted to this Department. A copy of said report was forwarded to the then governor of this District for transmission to Congress, as required by the section referred to.

It thus appears that the board of appraisers were employed in this work about one hundred and fifteen working days, for which service they claim to be entitled to the sum of $690 each, being at the rate of six dollars per diem for the time employed, amounting in all to the sum of $3,450.

The services for which compensation is claimed by the board of appraisers, were performed to the satisfaction of this Department, and the amount thereof is believed to be reasonable and just, in view of the difficult and important nature of the duties performed by them. The same rate of compensation, six dollars per diem, was allowed and paid to the board of appraisers for their services in appraising the value of squares 687 and 688, recently purchased by the Government.

In view of the foregoing facts I have the honor to recommend that an item similar to the inclosed estimate be inserted in one of the pending appropriation bills.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this a debatable question?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a statement of the law on which the point of order is founded, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Then I will address to the committee a word in explanation of my amendment. I have already submitted the letter of the Secretary, and I will state that I have cut down the appropriation nearly $1,000 on the amount asked for. I will state also that the commissioners found $250,000 worth of property belonging to the United States that the United States had lost sight of entirely.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make an unusual request of the committee. It is that we suspend work in this part of this bill and go forward to the sections relating to the Post-Office Department. The member of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER,] who has charge of that portion of the bill, is called away to a funeral, which he must attend in a few minutes, and I desire that while he is here we shall act upon that portion of the bill in relation to the post-office appropriations. I ask, therefore, that we shall turn to page 21, where section 2 begins; and when that is disposed of we can turn back and resume the consideration of this portion of the bill.

No objection was made, and the House proceeded to the consideration of section 2 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. To enable the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to close the appropriation accounts upon the books of his office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, he is hereby authorized to transfer from such appropriation accounts upon the books of his office as show a credit balance to accounts which show a debit balance a sufficient amount in each case to balance the said appropriation accounts.

Mr. TYNER. I move to add to that section the following:

Also to enable the Postmaster-General to adjust and pay the compensation for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes according to the provisions of an act "making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874," approved March 3, 1873, he is hereby authorized and empowered to use for this purpose so much as may be necessary of the unexpended balance of the amount appropriated for deficiencies in the revenues of the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That to enable the Postmaster-General to carry out that provision of section 84 of the act approved June 8, 1874, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," which refers to the readjustment of the salary of postmasters at certain fourth and fifth class offices, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the said Department, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1874.

Mr. TYNER. I offer the following as a substitute for that section:

That to enable the Postmaster-General to carry out, so far as certain fourth-class officers are concerned, that provision of section 84 of the act approved June 8, 1872, entitled, "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," which provides for the retroactive adjustment of claims of postmasters when there is an extraordinary increase in the revenues, he is hereby authorized and empowered to use for this purpose the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of the unexpended balance of the amount appropriated for deficiencies in the revenues of the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee rise for a moment in order to allow action to be had upon the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4840) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4529) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, and 16.

That the House recede from their disagreements to the amendments numbered 1 and 13.

That the House recede from their disagreements to the amendments numbered 7, 8, 9, and 10, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out by amendment numbered 8 the word "not," and strike out the word proposed to be inserted; and in lieu of the word "Baltimore" in said amendment insert "Washington;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "written," where it first occurs in the House amendment, and strike out the proviso from the same; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the nineteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, modified by striking out the word "garden;" and the House agree to the same.

JAS. M. TYNER,
J. B. PACKER,
JOHN HANCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. R. WEST,
T. W. FERRY,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] to explain the action of the conference committee upon that clause of the bill put on by the Senate and agreed to by the House with an amendment in reference to sending off documents and books on hand.

Mr. TYNER. The clause was not substantially changed in any respect; some of the words added by the House were stricken out in conference, but in no way changing the effect of the provision.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. That is the amendment as proposed by the House to the Senate amendment?

Mr. TYNER. Yes; in other words, the conference report is precisely the action of the House yesterday in regard to public documents. I think it is due to myself to make a single remark if the House will bear with me. The fact that I have had charge of this appropriation bill, and of the conference report, might lead to the supposition, unless I should so state in positive words, that I have favored the partial restoration of the franking privilege. I desire only to say in justice to myself that I have been opposed to it all the time, but have not been disposed to antagonize the wishes of the House in that respect.

Mr. SPEER. You shed no tears over it.

Mr. FORT. I move that this bill, as passed, be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report has not yet been adopted.

Mr. TYNER. I will state the portion of the amendment adopted by the House that was stricken out by the conference committee. It was the proviso which read as follows:

Provided, That speeches reproduced from and printed otherwise than in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and speeches delivered elsewhere than in Congress, shall, not be construed as public documents or be embraced in the provisions of this section.

The object of the Committee on Appropriations in recommending that proviso to the House yesterday, and the object of the House in agreeing to it, evidently was that the original amendment of the Senate should not authorize any speeches delivered outside of Congress to be sent under the frank of a member of Congress. But upon a closer examination of the language of the Senate amendment it was concluded by the conference committee that it was amply broad enough to exclude those speeches any way, and therefore the proviso was stricken out as surplusage.

Then one other change in respect to the franking of garden seeds. The committee of conference agreed to strike out the word "garden," so that the provision might embrace all seeds transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. SPEER. Are these documents and seeds permitted to go through the mails on the written frank of a member?

Mr. TYNER. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. SPEER. Until the 1st of December next?

Mr. TYNER. Until the 1st of December next; and that applies also to all documents now printed, or now ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPEER. What was the salary of the postmaster at New York City fixed at?

Mr. TYNER. At $8,000 a year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not this bill restore the franking privilege with the exception of the correspondence of members?

Mr. TYNER. It does not permanently.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But so far as it goes in respect to the time?

Mr. TYNER. It does so far as it goes in time. It restores the franking privilege in all respects, except the private correspondence of members, up to the 1st day of December next. After the 1st day of December next there is dropped from the franking privilege the public documents printed by order of Congress except the Agricultural Reports, which are permitted to continue to go free through the mails.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Are speeches taken from the RECORD and published allowed to go free?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. TYNER. I wish to say only one word further. It has been suggested to me that in the hurry of debate a moment ago, in referring to the correspondence of members, I used the term "private correspondence." What I meant to say was that the correspondence of members of Congress, whether it related to their official duties or otherwise, is not provided for under this franking privilege.

The question being taken on adopting the report of the committee of conference, there were—ayes 120, noes 38.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 23, noes 136.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAMILTON. We had a record by yeas and nays on this identical question yesterday.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. TYNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 4840) for the support of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes:

An act (H. R. No. 4820) authorizing the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company to straighten the line of their road;

An act (H. R. No. 4861) granting a pension to Louis Heinley;

An act (H. R. No. 4857) extending the privilege of the Library of Congress to the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

An act (H. R. No. 4850) authorizing the oppointment of gaugers for the customs service at the port of Philadelphia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 1328) to amend sections 1675, 1676, 1681, and 1682 of the Revised Statutes.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR TERRITORIAL RAILROADS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I rise to submit a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States, and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same, with amendments, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2 after "defile," on page 2, in line 11, down to and including line 20.

Strike out on page 2, line 23 of section 3 of the amendment, "or," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and where such provision shall not have been made."

And the House agree to the same.

W. TOWNSEND,
JACKSON ORR,
W. S. HERNDON,
Managers on the part of the House.
W. M. STEWART,
T. O. HOWE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the language that this report proposes to strike from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the second page of the bill, after the word "defile," strike out the following: Provided, however, That any State hereafter formed, within the limits of which a railroad the right of way for which, under the provisions of this act or any part thereof, shall be situated, shall have full authority at all times to regulate and limit the charges for the transportation of persons and freight over the same so far as exclusively within the State, and to prevent discrimination in such transportation: And provided further, That all such rights of way shall be subject to the authority of any State hereafter formed through which said railroad shall pass as if the land occupied by such way had been originally granted by such State.

Mr. HOLMAN. The purpose which I had in view in calling for the reading of the part of the bill proposed to be struck out is now accomplished; and I wish to say a word upon this report. The House (with great deliberation, I think) adopted the clause just reported conferring upon the States that may hereafter be formed in the territories in which these roads may be located the power to regulate the subject of transportation within their limits. Not only the amendments which I had the honor to submit, but also the amendment which the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR]——

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to a point of order as to the consideration of this report. The report of a committee of conference is undoubtedly privileged; but after being presented, the question of its consideration may be raised in order that the House may decide whether it will at once dispose of it or not. I will not raise that question, provided the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] is going to put this report right through without debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not sustain the point of order of the gentleman from Maine, because in his opinion it comes too late.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I claim the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. This is a very important matter, and——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] who has charge of this report, and who he understood yielded a few minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I insist on raising the question of consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the House to adopt this report. Upon that question I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order that this House does not know what it is doing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that point is well taken. The Chair will not entertain further business until order is restored.

After a pause,

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I submit to the Chair that, although I was not recognized, I endeavored to raise the question of consideration as soon as the report was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have risen to a point of order, and I desire that I shall have it decided before further proceedings take place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair refused to sustain the point made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] on the ground that it was made too late. That gentleman now states that he made the point immediately upon the finishing of the reading of the report.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rose for that very purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon that statement the occupant of the chair sustains the point of order that, the question of consideration being raised, the House has a right to decide whether it will proceed with the consideration of this report or go into Committee of the Whole again.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call the previous question upon the adoption of the report. I wish only to say that the bill stands now as it originally came from the House committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have a point of order also which I wish to submit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear one gentleman at a time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submitted his report to the House. After he had done so I called for the reading of certain portions of the bill struck out by the action of the Senate and of the committee of conference. When the language proposed to be struck out had been read I proceeded, without any interference at all upon the part of the gentleman making the report, to discuss the main amendment made to the bill as passed by the House. I had proceeded for several minutes with my remarks before I was interrupted by the gentleman from Maine. I submit that I was on the floor, not by the courtesy of any gentleman, but in accordance with the rules of the House and in my own right; that I had a right to submit the remarks I was making.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that he rose and called for the reading of the report, and was recognized for that purpose; but that he held the floor in his own right, he is mistaken, as the Chair had recognized, as he was compelled to do under the rules, the gentleman from Pennsylvania who submitted the report of the committe of conference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania still held the floor, and the gentleman from Indiana was speaking only by his permission.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the Chair whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked to be recognized?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He certainly did when he submitted the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. But when he had submitted the report I rose and took the floor for the purpose of discussing it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana demanded the reading of the report, which he had a right to do. After the report was read, the gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded the previous question on agreeing to the report. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] now rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a fraud attempted to be perpetrated upon the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The allegation the gentleman from Indiana makes, that there is a fraud attempted to be perpetrated upon the House, is false.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not become excited, as I am not charging him with attempting any fraud.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I say there is a fraud attempted to be perpetrated upon the country if not upon the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is too old to show the passion of a child. I say a fraud is being perpetrated upon the country by the passage of the bill in its present form.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I deny it. It comes here unanimously recommended by the committees in both Houses.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course if I am not entitled to be heard I will take my seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has been speaking by the sufferance of the Chair. He is not entitled to the floor unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has charge of the conference report, yields to him. If the House shall vote down the demand for the previous question, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana as entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am willing, perfectly willing, if the House is willing, that the gentleman from Indiana shall have five minutes to make his remarks if I shall have five minutes to reply to them.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I insist on my demand for the previous question. This conference report is all right and is a unanimous report from the committees of both Houses.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 100, noes 44.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I demand tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I now demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 111.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays; there was no quorum on the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum was required.

The House divided; and there were ayes 17, noes not counted.

So (one-fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative) tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I demand the reading of the report of the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio demands the reading of the report of the committee of conference, which requires unanimous consent, as the report has already been once read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on agreeing to the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 140, noes 34.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 154.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 28, noes not counted.

So (one-fifth of those present not having voted in the affirmative) tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LEACH. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as part of the debates some remarks I have prepared on the Louisiana question and general politics.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the deficiency appropriation bill, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have now come to the bottom of page 24, and I ask to go back to page 7, to take up that portion which was passed over.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Independent treasury:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to effect a transfer of accounts involving no appropriation out of the Treasury, namely:

For compensation to designated depositaries for receiving, safely keeping, and paying out public moneys, for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $2,342.09.

For contingent expenses under the act for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of public moneys for the fiscal year 1874, $8,740.64.

Mr. GARFIELD. These paragraphs in reference to the independent treasury make no appropriation out of the Treasury, and I ask they be considered as adopted.

It was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territorial governments:

Territory of Dakota: For amount due J. M. W. Jones for stationery for the fiscal year 1872, $135.75.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of that paragraph:

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of New Mexico: For amount due Manderfield & Tucker for printing in the English and Spanish languages the laws, journals, bills, &c., for the twenty-first session of the Legislative Assembly, as per letter of the Comptroller of the Treasury, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $4,378.24.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Wyoming: For amount due J. M. W. Jones for stationery for the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $677.61.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Washington: For amount ascertained to be due and unpaid for printing done and executed for the Legislative Assembly, as per letter of the First Controller of the Treasury, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1872 and prior years, $6,451.66.

Mr. STORM. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point?

Mr. STORM. It is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as an additional paragraph the following:

To pay Martin Kelly for printing the laws and journals of the seventh session of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho, $538,93.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following under the head of "mints and assay offices:"

For contingent expenses for the fiscal year 1875, $50,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move to strike out those two lines.

I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to one of the useless ways a government disposes of a large amount of money every year without advantage to any citizen. I never understood why a government should not use as much economy in its material operations as an individual should with his own affairs. The same conditions of management for success bears upon both. The total coinage of the United States mints from 1821 to 1870 was, of silver, $133,900,463.66. The total coinage of gold from 1821 to 1870 was $809,473,449. We have minted of gold since 1849 $540,000,000. But to-day there is not on this continent to exceed $125,000,000 of coin. I append a table interesting for study.

It must be evident to those who prefer economy to taxation that here is a good place to begin. The country hardly realizes that Congress since 1860 has made mint appropriations exceeding $11,300,000, an aggregate sum equal to more than one-twelfth of all coin on the continent to-day. To this must be added the cost of new mints, buildings, repairs, &c. For this vast expenditure the nation ought to be able to show some adequate return, but we cannot. No sooner have we coined these millions at millions' cost, no sooner have we stamped the impress of our nationality than our beautiful eagles take wing across the sea, there to enter the crucible of other nations to receive the impress of other nationalities.

For all practical purposes we might as well have spent these millions in coining iron or lead. Now, what we ought to do is to cease coinage, and so long as the balance of trade is against us send out our gold in ingots. What would the school-boys of the world say of the wisdom of grown up men if we marked each kernel of wheat and corn sold to foreigners, the mark to be ground off in the mills of Europe? There would be as much sense in such a proceeding as in the farce we are hourly, daily, and year after year enacting in marking our other merchandise our gold. It is true America is not alone in this play; other nations are equally silly. Every dollar received of this great measure of values goes through the honored dignity of wearing the nation's robes it happens to travel in. The sovereign flows through the crucible to the eagle, and the eagle to the sovereign; and what is the gain save a fleeting pride? In these days of steam and electricity an arrangement ought to be arrived at for a universal decimal coinage that would flow like one language all over the globe; but as we are not likely to do this immediately, we should at least study such economy as tax-payers in these times demand of us. We have many millions of coin in the sub-treasury in New York City, placed on deposit by importers and bankers. We need not disturb it. The certificates we issue upon it represent the gold. Merchants pay duties with them, and as we use the same certificates over and over again, we have no use for more coin until we resume specie payments, which can never be done by legislative commands before the condition of trade has prepared the way.

The assistant United States Treasurer in New York tells me that the shipments of gold to Europe are nearly all made in standard-weight double eagles. We are running our mints to their greatest capacity, for what? I see nothing save a sentimental amusement, and the expense of the amusement some six to eight hundred thousand dollars each year for the people to pay. Under the congressional financial plank voted to a law as a portion of a party platform by this Congress we are entering upon the coinage of silver for another sentimental amusement, and it will be equally expensive and profitless.

We as a nation seem to forget that gold and silver, while only merchandise, will find the market where it will command the highest price as surely as water will seek its level. Silver and gold are each debased in coinage 10 per cent. by copper. Silver in the world's markets to-day is about 3 per cent. less than gold. We debase our silver besides the 10 per cent. of copper, 6.66; so that we cannot float our silver where gold commands over 9.66, except where its convenience becomes a necessity. Men will sacrifice something for accelerating small transactions. It is true we might force men to use silver in small trades by destroying the paper fractional currency, although many men prefer the convenience of paper; still while brokers in bullion can make ½ per cent. in selling silver, it will pass away from the country. One-sixteenth premium in France always draws silver from Germany.

I have called the attention of the committee to these facts, hoping that those who come after us will be induced to give the subject such study as will lead to the saving of vast sums of money now wasted that otherwise might be used for man's progress and happiness.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and call for a vote.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 222 insert as follows:

For payment of $42.42, amount certified to be due by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to J. B. Eugene, late lieutenant of the Forty-Third Regiment Wisconsin Infantry.

Mr. SAWYER. The following letter from the Treasury Department explains this amendment:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to recommend that $42.42 having been found due J. B. Eugene, late lieutenant of the Forty-Third Regiment Wisconsin Infantry, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, provision be made in the pending deficiency bill for the reappropriation of the above amount from the balance of the appropriation "subsistence of the Army, 1871," carried to the surplus funds under the fifth section act of June 20, 1874.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Assistant Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following paragraph:

For transportation of United States securities prior to June 13, 1874, as per certificate of the accounting-officers of the Treasury, $20,559.07.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the paragraph for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a question. In addition to the paragraph just read, there is another item for amount due Adams Express Company for the fiscal year 1874, $1,307.40. How is it that there are two items apparently covering the same period?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose that is on account of the form in which the accounts were kept.

Mr. MAYNARD. But this seems to cover the same time.

Mr. GARFIELD. The words "prior to June 30, 1874," cover the balances for years preceding the fiscal year 1874.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HERNDON. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line 249 add the following:

To pay W. D. Mims for witness fees for attendance upon the congressional committee on elections in Louisiana, 15th December, 1869, $111.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TODD. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in as an additional paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Morgan Rawls, contestee, expenses case of Sloan vs. Rawls, first district of Georgia, $1,500.

To pay John P. C. Shanks, expenses case of Shanks vs. Neff, in the ninth district of Indiana, $1,040.

To pay George Q. Cannon, expenses case of Maxwell vs. Cannon, Delegate from Utah, $750.

To pay George A. Sheridan, expenses case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback, at large from Louisiana, $1,735.

To pay Effingham Lawrence, contestant, expenses case of Lawrence vs. Sypher, first district of Louisiana, $2,000.

Provided, That no person hereafter seated by this House shall have any benefit of this appropriation.

Mr. SPEER, I raise the point of order that there is no law authorizing the payment of these sums of money.

The CHAIRMAN. This was made in order by the House.

Mr. SPEER. There was an amendment made in order by the House which was voted on the other night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Elections were authorized to report either on the sundry civil bill or on the deficiency bill.

Mr. SPEER. But they were not authorized to report upon both of them, and they did report on the other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will find on looking at the resolution that it is sufficiently broad to cover this amendment.

Mr. TODD. It is in the line of the amendment adopted the other evening by the House under the same resolution.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the Chair will not decide my point of order until the order of the House is read.

Mr. TODD. I simply desire to explain to the committee that when the amendment was offered yesterday the committee were not ready to report upon these claims, because they had not concluded their investigation of them, and these are simply supplemental to those which were offered last evening, and in the same line and in the same order and subject to the same proviso.

Mr. SPEER. My point of order is that the order of the House did not authorize the committee to offer an amendment of this nature to both the sundry civil bill and the deficiency bill. They might do it in one or the other of them. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so far suspended that it may be in order at the time the sundry civil appropriation bill or the deficiency appropriation bill is under consideration in Committee of the Whole to move an amendment thereto to pay the expenditures in whole or part of such parties to contested-election cases as the Committee on Elections may recommend.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It gave them a selection as to which bill they would offer the amendment to; that was all.

Mr. SPEER. I think that is the proper construction of the resolution; but I do not wish to take up the time of the committee by taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Was this amendment first offered to the other bill?

Mr. TODD. O, no.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then it is clearly in order.

Mr. SPEER. I rise to oppose the amendment. This abuse of paying congressional contestants has proven so enormous, that Congress passed a general law only two years ago absolutely prohibiting the payment of any contestant or contestee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was simply a law that they should not be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SPEER. Now in this Congress, under the accumulated pressure of gentlemen on both sides of the House, very excellent and worthy gentlemen, we have adopted an amendment embracing a large number of the parties who have had contests in this Congress, a general log-rolling amendment, putting the good with the bad, the deserving with the undeserving, democrats with republicans—and this log-rolling effort is made on both sides—personal appeals are made and the judgment of the House is largely controlled by personal considerations.

I trust that the committee will lift its hand here and now to stay this kind of legislation; for while I admit that a few of those named in the amendment should be paid, there are others named who clearly should not be paid. I appeal to members of the House to resist this vicious system of legislation, based upon personal solicitation on this floor and personal lobbying by gentlemen, some of whom have no more moral right to this money than they would have if they were to walk up to the Treasury and put their hands into it in the darkness of midnight and take it out. I hope the House will do justice to the people behind us as well as to those with whom we are associated upon this floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

To pay John E. Neff, contestant with John P. C. Shanks for expenses, $1,500.

Mr. SPEER. I want to ask my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] whether the Committee on Elections did not by a vote refuse to pay Mr. SHANKS one dollar and when and how that action was reconsidered?

Mr. TODD. When the case of Mr. SHANKS was first presented to the committee it refused to make any allowance, on the supposition that he had not been subject to any expense; that no testimony had been taken in the case. Mr. SHANKS afterward laid before the committee incontrovertible testimony that he had been subjected to expense to twice the amount allowed by the committee now. I may state that in every one of these cases every item was closely scrutinized by the committee, and we rejected fully 50 per cent. of the claims. I may mention as one item that in no case has the committee allowed anything for attorneys' fees.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to reserve the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. TODD. Moreover the Committee on Elections in making up the amendment were not governed by any log-rolling influence; they were not influenced by any consideration of that sort. They were influenced strictly by the idea of allowing compensation in all cases where the contest had been made honestly and meritoriously.

Mr. SPEER. Did General SHANKS take any testimony?

Mr. TODD. Yes; a large amount.

Mr. SPEER. Another word. The expenses of contestants of elections here are largely made up of enormous fees paid to counsel. When they come to employ counsel in this city they charge them one, two, or three thousand dollars, and tell them that no matter how much the charge is, they will not have to pay it out of their pockets, but Congress will pay it.

Mr. TODD. Not one dollar of fees charged by any counsel in Washington has been allowed.

Mr. SPEER. Why do you report in favor of giving General SHANKS over one thousand dollars and not one dollar to Mr. Neff?

Mr. TODD. For the reason that Mr. Neff made no claim. We allowed it to General SHANKS because he expended twice that amount in his effort to obtain a seat here, to which the House says he was entitled.

Mr. KASSON. I will state my point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] that not being reported from the Committee on Elections it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. NIBLACK. It is certainly germane to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. But the order of the House related only to cases reported from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. TODD. Mr. Neff took no testimony, was subject to no expense, and made no claim for any allowance.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I will say further that under the laws of Indiana Mr. Neff had not the slightest case, not the shade of the shadow of a case.

The question was upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Elections.

Mr. SPEER. I ask for a division on that amendment. I shall resist it to the last extremity.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 35.

Mr. SPEER. Is that a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SPEER. Then I call for a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPEER, and Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 103, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPEER. I give notice that I shall call the yeas and nays on this amendment in the House.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to insert after the amendment just adopted that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers be, and hereby are, authorized and required, in the settlement of all accounts for the services of laborers, workmen, and mechanics employed by or on behalf of the Government of the United States between the 25th day of June, 1868, the date of the act constituting eight hours a day's work for all such laborers, workmen, and mechanics, and the date of the passage of this act, to settle and pay for the same, without reduction on account of reduction of hours of labor by said act, when it shall be made to appear that such was the sole cause of the reduction of wages, and a sufficient sum for said purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in order to enable said officers to pay to the laborers, workmen, and mechanics mentioned in said act of June 25, 1868, the full compensation of a day's wages for each and every eight hours' labor performed, without evasion or subterfuge.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the point of order on that amendment that there is now no law authorizing the payment of that money.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Allow me to be heard. The point of order has been twice before made in Committee of the Whole and twice overruled. It seems to me but fair at least that a few words should be said upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The point of order was first made on the 6th of March, 1872, when a measure similar to this was proposed as an amendment to the deficiency bill. Last year this same amendment was moved to the sundry civil bill, and the same point of order was made by the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. WILLARD. Mr. DAWES was in the chair, and overruled the point of order. In the first instance the amendment was offered by Mr. DAWES, and Mr. Stevenson, of Ohio, was in the chair. The point of order was raised by Mr. Farnsworth, of Illinois, and it was overruled. I ask the Clerk to read the decision of the Chair at that time upon that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule on the point of order. It seems to the Chair that as the law in force during the period covered by this proposed amendment authorized and required the payment of a day's wages for eight hours' labor, if workmen employed by the Government have been paid but a part, say eight-tenths of what was due them according to law, there is needed no new legislation other than an appropriation to authorize the payment of the remainder. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The same decision was made last year upon an amendment of similar character.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will follow the ruling heretofore made upon a similar amendment, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a large number of men in this country are interested in this appropriation. It is the law of the land to-day that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for every man engaged upon any public works of the United States. This law went into effect on the 25th of June, 1868, but it was disregarded and set aside by the ministerial officers charged with its execution. These workmen have a fair claim against the Government for the two hours of daily extra labor which they have been compelled to perform by reason of the wrongful evasion of the law of the land by ministerial or executive officers of the Government.

On the 19th of May, 1869, the President of the United States, finding that this law was being disregarded, issued his proclamation, commanding the ministerial officers to obey the law. They, however, still continued to disobey. On the 3d of May, 1872, a law was passed to pay these workmen the amount out of which they had been cheated between the 25th of June, 1868, and the 19th of May, 1869. After the proclamation of the President the law was still defied. I say that the law-making power of the Government should provide that these men be paid for the two extra hours of daily labor which they performed after that date, the same as they were paid for the period between June 25, 1868, and May 19, 1869. I have stated the case in a nut-shell. In the five minutes of time allowed this is all I can do. These are poor men, men without influence in the ranks of wealth and power; but their demand for justice ought to be heard and met without another hour's delay. Whenever it is my fortune to be in Congress they shall never be without an advocate here, and the people's representatives shall pass upon their claims till at last tardy justice is meted to them. I am glad that my last words in this House are spoken as their advocate and friend.

Mr. CREAMER. I trust the House will give this amendment the consideration which it deserves. It seems to me that the Government of the United States, with the sanction of the committee in this House having charge of our finances, is making an attempt to swindle the workmen of the country connected with the various navy-yards, arsenals, and other public works out of nearly $500,000. I have no special knowledge concerning the merits of this case, not having been a member of the House when the question was first brought up, but on general principles it is a false policy for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or any other official in power in this House or any other branch of the Government, to attempt to reject, particularly at this time, the claims of men who have just demands against the Government. Why, sir, we pass appropriation bills here authorizing the expenditure of millions of dollars annually for the support of Indians, the greater portion of which money never perhaps reaches the Indians, but is divided up among contractors. If we can be liberal in that respect, and many other respects, why should we be unjust to these workingmen in the East.

I trust the Government will see that, instead of suspending public works, instead of diminishing the compensation of Government laborers at this time, it is the proper policy to extend public works and to increase compensation.

It is always the policy of a wise government, when there is depression of trade or financial panic, to enlarge its departments of labor, to increase the amount of Government work, to inaugurate new enterprises, to extend public works instead of suspending them. Therefore I trust that members will favorably consider this proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were ayes 7, noes not counted.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Did a quorum vote?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair a quorum did not vote. Are tellers insisted upon?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. CREAMER. Certainly we want tellers. I want to see how many friends these workingmen have in this House when a proposition is made to give them that to which they are entitled. They have a great many professed friends about election time.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB, of Kansas, and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 67.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I do not insist upon a further count. I am satisfied that the House does not intend to adopt this proposition.

[The tellers retired from their places.]

Mr. CREAMER. I am not satisfied. I insist that a quorum shall vote.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. CREAMER. It is not too late. The Chair had not announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who offered the amendment and who was one of the tellers stated that a further count was not insisted upon.

Mr. CREAMER. I insist that it is our right to have this amendment decided by a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A further count has been waived; and the amendment rejected. The gentleman's demand comes too late.

Mr. CREAMER. I insist that I made my point in time.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is overruled.

Mr. FARWELL. I offer the following amendment:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay R. A. Connolly not exceeding $1,460, the amount of a draft drawn by Major Houston, United States engineer in charge of harbor improvements at Chicago, upon the United States depository at Chicago, October 2, 1871, which was burned in the Chicago fire, October 9, 1871, upon satisfactory proof being furnished him that said draft was burned and destroyed and has not been paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public buildings:

For the completion of the following public buildings: For the court-house and post-office at Omaha, Nebraska, $10,000; post-office and court-house at Indianapolis, Indiana, $12,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend by inserting the following:

That the provisions contained in the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes," limiting the compensation to be allowed for the disbursement of moneys appropriated for the construction of any public building was intended and shall be deemed and held to limit the compensation to be allowed to any disbursing officer who disburses moneys appropriated for and expended in the construction of any public building as aforesaid, to ½ of 1 per cent. for said services.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the Chairman is wrong in sustaining the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order, and the Clerk will read on.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish the gentleman from Ohio to state the grounds of his point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late, as the paragraph has been passed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. It is not too late, for I called the attention of the Chair to it at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman from Virginia, and it is now too late.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I was on the floor and used every effort possible to call the attention of the Chair to it. I do not think it is too late.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completion of building for United States post-office and court-house, New York, including cost of heating and ventilating apparatus and the cost of area along park front, as per report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, $388,160.08.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike that out, as the same provision is contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move to insert the following:

To enable the Architect of the Capitol Extension to procure a suitable hydraulic elevator for the south end of the Capitol, $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order against that amendment, that there is no law authorizing any such appropriation.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. There is a general law authorizing appropriations for the repair and improvement of this building, and such amendments have uniformly been ruled in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would not be a suitable amendment to this deficiency appropriation bill, and therefore rules it out on the ground that it is not germane.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairing damage (caused by fire) to the building for custom-house and post-office in Newport, Rhode Island, $7,419.43.

Mr. EAMES. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And $3,712.50 for the erection of a building for storage and other purposes connected with the custom-house at Newport, Rhode Island.

Mr. FIELD. I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not in compliance with any law, and is therefore not in order to this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, lights, and water for public buildings, being for the fiscal year 1875, $40,313.26; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation of the same character made for the use of the fiscal year 1874 is hereby continued and rendered available for the service of the current fiscal year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move the following amendment:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay vouchers for expenditures incurred prior to June 30, 1874, from appropriations for the present fiscal year, as follows: On account of furniture for public buildings the sum of $500, and on account of the repair and preservation of public buildings the sum of $5,000, and the same shall not involve any increase of the appropriations specified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the United States depositary at Buffalo, New York, being for the fiscal year 1875, $891.02.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to correct an error in that paragraph. It should be for the fiscal year 1871 instead of the fiscal year 1875, and I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay Dawson Tank & Co., of New London, Connecticut, for completing the landing-dock at Little Gull Island, New York, from the appropriation made by act of June 23, 1874, $2,627.40; which sum is hereby continued and made available for said purpose from the unexpended balance of said appropriation.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing illustrations of results of the Polaris expedition under direction of the Secretary of the Navy, $15,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order there is no law authorizing any such expenditure.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In answer to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana I wish to say this is simply a provision for printing the results of that expedition which was undertaken under a direct law passed by Congress. This whole matter was under the supervision of Congress. It authorized the sailing of the expedition, and of course the publication of the report of the results of that expedition. The amendment is therefore in order to this bill. I have no doubt on this statement of facts the gentleman from Indiana will himself say my amendment is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on my point that this is not in order. This Polaris expedition was a private enterprise and never entered upon by the United States under the laws of the United States. What was done by the United States was merely incidental to this private enterprise. It was a private and not a public undertaking, and this amendment provides for an appropriation not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the amendment is in order, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me make another suggestion. There is a law upon the statute-book requiring that all such matters must absolutely have their first consideration by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That does not refer to amendments in the Committee of the Whole on appropriation bills. We are continually appropriating for such purposes on appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not the rule of the House, but the law and the obligation is absolute on the part of the House that every proposition to print must be first acted on by the Committee on Printing. It is the law, and in that view this amendment is not in order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We have appropriated in other bills for like printing. In the sundry civil appropriation bill we voted a million dollars for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 16.

So the amendment was adopted, no further count being demanded.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay William Syphax in full the balance to equalize his pay with that of an assistant messenger, $655.38.

Mr. ARCHER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how old this claim is?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not a claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in defiance of the law instead of being in pursuance of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. An appropriation was made. The case went to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims decided that the claimant was entitled to more than the amount appropriated. The following was the finding of the court:

The petitioner claims for services in the Interior Department in a capacity similar or equivalent to that of an assistant messenger.

The court find that the petitioner served in such capacity from the 1st of March, 1851, to the 7th of December, 1870, and during that period received pay from time to time, but in an amount not equal to that of an assistant messenger.

That in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for 1871, an appropriation was made in these words: "For additional pay heretofore withheld from William Syphax, to equalize his compensation with that of an assistant messenger, $2,180."

The said sum of $2,180 has not been paid to the said Syphax, but refused.

And on the facts stated the court find that said Syphax is entitled to recover against the United States the said sum of $2,180, and judgment is ordered therefor.

OPINION.—The appropriation made by the act of Congress is as authoritative as any other act of Congress which makes the law of the land. It is specific as to the amount and as to the person, and it is not to be questioned or reduced here nor anywhere else. And the evidence filed in the case shows that the amount appropriated and claimed in this suit is less than that earned. It should be said it was not disputed by the Attorney-General, but only submitted to the court.

This appropriation is to satisfy the finding of the court, to pay what the Court of Claims awarded as due.

Mr. STORM. This claim has been rejected over and over again.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. At the request of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who is absent from the Hall, I send up the following amendment agreed to by him.

The Clerk read as follows:

To supply a deficiency in the moneys appropriated for the support of totally disabled volunteer soldiers in the national homes, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] agreed to that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 365 insert the following:

Provided, That so much of the appropriation for subsistence of the Army as may be necessary may be applied to the purchase of subsistence stores for sale to officers for the use of themselves and their families, and to commanders of companies or other organizations, for the use of enlisted men of their companies or organizations, and the proceeds of all sales of subsistence supplies shall be hereafter exempt from being covered into the Treasury, and shall be immediately available for the purchase of further supplies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 403 insert as follows:

For clothing to the seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys enlisting in the Navy, $90,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman perhaps is not aware that the papers in this matter were sent over to the Senate, and that this was put in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I make the point of order that if this is not the same item as has gone to the Senate there is no law for it.

Mr. MYERS. If the gentleman will read my amendment he will see that it is not the same item as that to which he refers. The question of giving an outfit of clothing to sailors on their enlistment has had the careful examination of the Naval Committee, to which my bill for that purpose was referred, and by their unanimous instruction I reported it favorably to this House. It was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and, I was led to believe, had their unanimous approval. No separate law for it, however, is necessary—only an appropriation—and I offer the amendment now not only as an act of long-delayed justice to the sailors, but in pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, who sent to our committee this petition for its passage, signed by Rear-Admiral Case and all the officers of the ships in the North Atlantic fleet, lately off Key West, one hundred and seventy-nine in number, urging in the strongest terms that the measure will bring much greater efficiency to the naval service and put an end to a great wrong upon our seamen.

This appropriation is only for the balance of the present fiscal year—not for any deficiency otherwise—but it establishes a precedent which will be followed hereafter, that the cost of a sailor's outfit shall not be deducted from his pay. We clothe our soldiers and appropriate the money to pay the expenses. We appropriate annually—$100,000 this very year—for the clothing of the marines who tread the same decks with the sailors, and there is no special law needed to sanction it, for having an Army and Navy the right to appropriate for their subsistence and clothing follows as a matter of course. By a singular omission Congress, year after year, has neglected to appropriate for the clothing of the sailor.

The Navy Department has a Bureau of Provisions and Clothing. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] might as well argue that there is no law allowing provisions for the seamen, yet no one contends that the price of their food should be deducted from their pay. Now, each year we appropriate for the pay of the sailor. Does he receive the amount voted? No, sir! the very first day of his enlistment sixty dollars—three months' pay—are deducted from him and he is marked on the ship's book in debt for that much clothing, besides ten or twenty dollars to the shipping-master or boarding-house keeper, more of this clothing debt being added subsequently. Surely this great wrong is not generally known or it would not have been permitted so long. For months and months the sailor's family look in vain for a support of which the Government has deprived them. What is the consequence? The sailor feels that he has been entrapped and he often takes the first opportunity to desert. When a chance occurs there are sometimes fifty desertions at a time from this cause. But the chance does not generally occur for five or six months, for Jack Tar is not even allowed to go ashore until he has worked off this load of unjust debt.

Captain S. G. Luce, of the Navy, wrote to me, under date of June 8, 1874:

On board one of the ships of the squadron to which I was lately attached the indebtedness of the crew after being ten months on board averaged twenty-six dollars per man, and the total indebtedness of the crew of a first-rate, on leaving the United States not long since for a foreign station, amounted to $31,778. The rule under our present system is for a sailor to enter the Navy loaded down with debt for inferior clothing. To work off this debt is almost hopeless, so that men are often driven to desert in hopes of bettering their condition.

I have received from the Navy Department the following statement of desertions from our Navy between January 1, 1867, and October 1, 1873, and they continue in the same ratio: In 1867 there were 2,396; in 1868 there were 1,914; in 1869 there were 1,531; in 1870 there were 1,731; in 1871 there were 1,851; in 1872 there were 1,892; and in 1873 up to the 1st of October 1,294; making 12,639 desertions in less than seven years—nearly 50 per cent. more than the whole number of men now allowed the Navy.

Commodore Reynolds, late Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, writes: "We desire to give the seamen an outfit on enlistment without charge." The Chiefs of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing have for years recommended this to be done. The Secretary of the Navy has urged it in his annual reports, and Secretary Robeson in his letter of March 24, 1874, transmitting to the Naval Committee the petition of the officers of the North Atlantic squadron—which I have before me—earnestly indorses their request.

Not only is this step demanded as a matter of right, but it will materially benefit the naval service, and so all these officers testify. Commodore Reynolds informs me that the average period of the desertions I have named is seven months, so that the Government loses the men just when it has educated them to be skilled seamen; and besides that, the deserter when still in debt carries off clothing for which a deficiency cannot fail to arise; in fact, the Senate has placed upon the sundry civil appropriation bill to-day, and very justly, an appropriation to cover a deficiency of the kind which has been accru-ing for years, so that even in the matter of money the Government has not been the gainer by this injustice.

Every other government clothes its sailors. I know no law by which we deduct this cost from the money appropriated to pay our seamen. In fact I can find no regulation to authorize this cruel wrong. It is done simply in pursuance of a custom, originally adopted for the benefit of the paymasters who sold the clothing, which abuse has been abolished, a custom which would be more honored in the breach than in the observance. We pay for the clothing of the soldiers and marines every year of their service. Complete justice will not be had in this particular till we do the same for the sailors; but as reforms cannot always be accomplished at a bound, and the Navy Department and naval officers only plead for the outfit, let us at least give this outfit, and do so at once, for the four remaining months of this fiscal year. Start the sailor out of debt. You have no right to load him down with such an obligation. There are but eighty-five hundred men in our Navy; they seldom vote, and their petitions rarely reach these halls; but in peace and war the American sailors have reflected the highest credit on our country, and I shall be rejoiced if, before closing my congressional term, I can accomplish for them this act of supreme justice.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have taken some interest in the Navy and its sailors ever since I have been here. There is only one thing to be said about this appropriation. It is simply because the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing report that the appropriations have not been made large enough in the regular bill. This matter is cared for for the coming year by a clause in the sundry civil bill, which reads, "for clothing of the Navy, $150,000."

Mr. MYERS. This amendment is not to provide for that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If it is, there is no need, I think, for this appropriation. The appropriation in that bill is larger than that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and large enough to meet all the wants of the Bureau. If, on the other hand, it is an appropriation which under the guise of a simple appropriation means to change the rules and regulations of the Navy Department, founded on law, then I am for one not willing to make that change here. This is not the place to make it. The amendment is subject first to the point of order which I have reserved; and if the point of order is not well taken, then I claim that here is no place for us to consider whether or not we can advantageously change a regulation which has existed for years. But the Senate has been liberal and has agreed to an appropriation of $150,000, and I have no information that leads me to believe that both these sums will be needed, and I do not think they are needed.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to be heard in reply for a moment.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I move to strike out the last word and I desire to say a few words only. I shall detain the House but a very short time; I am in earnest in this matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. MYERS. The provision to which the gentleman refers has been inserted in the sundry civil bill so as to give the Navy Department that deficiency which arises mainly out of this very wrong. It it is not to give the sailor his clothing free of charge. What I propose is that hereafter the sailor, on being given his outfit of clothing, shall have it as the soldier and the marine have it, free of charge. I find no regulation in the Book of Regulations of the Navy Department, and there is no law in the Revised Statutes which allows an officer of the Navy to deduct from the pay which we appropriate by law for the sailor the cost of his clothing.

It is time this wrong was corrected. I shall not be here longer than to-morrow, and as I stated I desire before my term expires to secure for the sailor this benefit, which is his right, and to prevent the wrong which he has hitherto been subjected to. We can do it here by providing that for the remainder of the fiscal year, in the enlistments hereafter occurring, this charge for clothing shall not be deducted from the sailor's pay. I hope the House will be as true to the sailors and to the necessities of the naval service as it has been to other defenders of the nation.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 12, noes 25.

Mr. MYERS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MYERS and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall insist upon a full count, for here is an appropriation of $80,000 which is not asked for by the Department.

Mr. MYERS. It is asked for by a letter from the Secretary of the Navy.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask permission of the House to turn back to line 415, for the purpose of moving an amendment which is approved by the Committee on Appropriations. My attention was called away at the time it was read. I move to insert after the paragraph ending line 415 the following:

For amount found due by the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury in settlement of claim of Francis Scala, late leader of the marine band, for commutation of quarters, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1871, $737.80.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Indian office:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to make up the deficiency in the general appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, for transportation of supplies provided for the Sioux Indians under treaty of April 29, 1868, including the Santee Sioux, the Yankton Sioux, and the Poncas, $75,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to have some explanation from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how so large a deficiency could have occurred in the supplies for a single year for this single tribe of Indians?

Mr. AVERILL. That is not a tribe of Indians; it embraces a great many tribes; it is a very large nation. If the gentleman will go there he will find about fifteen or twenty thousand Indians.

Mr. DUNNELL. The trouble with me was that it seemed to be a very large deficiency. An appropriation was made for the transportation of supplies, and how the Department could have incurred so large a deficiency as $75,000, I cannot understand.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. This is a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, the present fiscal year. For the last fiscal year the Government appropriated $150,000 for this purpose, and last year the Department asked for the same sum for transportation, &c., for this year. We gave what we thought a sufficient amount—only one-half of what was asked—$75,000. They have made a showing to us which satisfies us that the Department cannot possibly get along during this fiscal year without the amount asked.

Mr. CREAMER. I move to strike out this paragraph. Inasmuch as the President and members of the Cabinet have unanimously admitted that they owe five thousand mechanics and laborers of this country $500,000, and this House has refused to pay them, I do not see why we should be asked to make up a deficiency of $75,000 for the Sioux Indians. I hope we will determine now whether we will vote this large appropriation for this purpose.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I move to insert after the paragraph last read the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount due Henry Housman for supplies furnished the Red Cloud agency in December, 1873, and January, 1874, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $339.66.

For this amount due E. Nagle for oats, &c., furnished the Red Cloud agency in December, 1873, and April, 1874, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $245.46.

For this amount due H. Haas for supplies furnished the Red Cloud agency in November and December, 1873, and January and February, 1874, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $377.11.

For this amount due Jules Ecoffey & Co. for supplies furnished the Red Cloud agency in August and September, 1873, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $94.85.

For this amount due Jules Ecoffey for the delivery at the Red Cloud agency, under contract of March, 1874, 119,000 feet of sawed lumber, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1874, $1,779.05.

Mr. STEELE. I admit that it was with some surprise that, upon looking at this deficiency bill, which I supposed included all deficiencies for the service for the last fiscal year, I found there were some items which were not provided for. In Executive Document No. 69 of the present session of Congress I find these items which I have moved as an amendment. They are certified to by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House and to the House as being debts against the Government of the United States, and for which it is necessary for Congress to make an appropriation to pay.

I know all these men to whom these items relate. They are all residents of my Territory, all my constituents. The first, Mr. Housman, whose claim amounts to $339.66, is in no sense an Indian contractor. He is engaged in the hardware business in one of our towns, and has supplied articles to the Government for which he has not received pay. So it is with the other parties; they are all traders who have furnished supplies to the Government, which it honestly owes them for, and for which it has failed to pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want once for all to make the response which the Committee on Appropriations will make to a large number of amendments likely to be offered. In the document No. 69, to which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] refers, which is the book of deficiency estimates, there occurs a series of small and large amounts of Indian deficiencies, covering about seven printed pages, and amounting in the total to $471,349.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. And in another place there are items to the amount of to $70,000 more.

Mr. GARFIELD. And in another place there are $70,000 more, making considerably more than half a million dollars composed of little and large sums. Not one word of explanation accompanies them except the simple, naked statement that they are sums found due. Now I have no doubt some of these claims are just and should be paid. In some cases it will be a hardship if they are not paid and paid now. But the Committee on Appropriations believe that we ought not to be a mere perfunctory organization, a mere nodding committee, to say "yes" to whatever the Department sends to us.

I went to the Interior Department myself; I called upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and said to him that we could not consent to make appropriations on the mere naked statement that they were deficiencies; that if we could do this, all we would have to do would be to appropriate year after year what the Department asked, and let it expend the money as it pleased; that, as a matter of good government and sound policy, there ought to be something more definite and precise upon which to base our appropriations. In response to my visit, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs sent me a letter in which he said that a part of these expenses grew out of unexpected emergencies and a part had arisen because we did not appropriate enough for the years in which the expenses were incurred. But it is a matter for Congress to judge whether we appropriate enough. I do not doubt that there are many of these items that ought to be provided for; but I cannot say which they are. If we put in any it will be only a matter of guess. I therefore think the Committee on Appropriation did right in omitting all. Let the Departments understand that we must have definite, specific information before we vote this class of appropriations.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Why is it that the Department can pay all these large Indian contracts without any difficulty, but when the Indian agents go to farmers and to laborers, and pile up these little bills of $40, $50, $60, or $100, there is no money to pay them? These accounts come here and pass through the Department; your Treasury officials allow them; but you rise here and say you will not pay them, because they are small amounts.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does anybody say that we will not pay them because they are small amounts?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment, and I do so to express my astonishment that the Committee on Appropriations should so deliberately ignore the estimates for deficiencies for the Indian service sent in by the Interior Department, and to be found in detail in House Executive Document No. 69.

When at the last session of Congress but a part of the deficiencies for the year ending June 30, 1874, were allowed, it was my clear understanding, as I find it was that of others, that at this session they should be provided for in full. In some remarks made on this floor May 11, 1874, I said:

> I regret that while the deficiency bill gives all that is asked to sweep away the indebtedness of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, it provides for less than one-half of the amount asked for the debt of the present year, and will thus enable the payment of something less than 50 per cent. upon claims many of which have been due from the first months of the year.

Now, when the Department requests an appropriation for this deficiency and for others which have since accrued, the committee take no action whatever. It will not do to say that the Department has been negligent, for so long ago as January 13 the document to which I have alluded, (Executive Document No. 69,) and in which the claims are itemized, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and if that committee wanted any explanations beyond those given, there has been ample time to get them from all sources. If application had been made to the territorial representatives they could have shown the urgent need of an appropriation to meet these deficiencies, but I cannot find that any one of them has been summoned before the committee or the sub-committee, or consulted in any way.

Mr. Chairman, these deficiencies are, as I took opportunity to say at the last session, the direct and natural result of the failure on the part of Congress to make adequate appropriations for the Indian service. Whatever criticism may be made upon the Interior Department, it cannot be denied that its estimates for the Indians have been promptly laid before Congress, and had they been treated as the estimates of other Departments have been, most if not all of these deficiencies would have been avoided. But it is a notorious fact that for years these estimates, in the face of every representation and exigency, have been ruthlessly reduced. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been cut off, and yet the committee seem surprised that there are deficiencies. It would indeed be remarkable if there were none under such a state of affairs. All over the Indian country the Government has honest creditors whose patience is well-nigh exhausted by the gross and, as I think, wholly inexcusable neglect of Congress. It is costing the Department from 20 to 30 per cent. more to furnish Indian supplies than it would if they could be promptly paid for.

I say, as I have said before, that if any of the claims presented are thought to be extravagant or incorrect, they should be rejected; but I know that very many are not such, and that good men who have furnished supplies at fair rates and in good faith, who have really given effect and success to the so-called "peace policy," are, not a few of them, actually suffering for want of the money due from the Government. They have been used as no merchant would dare to use his creditors, and in a manner disgraceful in the extreme to a great government.

Whether it is wise or unwise to feed Indians, it is but just that, so long as it is the policy, the cost, however large it may be, should be promptly provided for and the credit of the Government sustained.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, sent yesterday to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which I will print in connection with my remarks, simply calling attention to the fact that during the last three years there has accrued to the surplus fund out of the appropriations made for the Indian Office over $725,000.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of this date, stating the necessity of certain deficiency appropriations for the service of his Bureau for the year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years.

I beg to invite your careful attention and consideration to this subject, and to the facts as stated by the Commissioner. Unless the relief asked for by him is granted, the Indian service must inevitably suffer serious detriment. His statement discloses both the propriety and necessity of the appropriations asked for, and arguments both of humanity and economy may be added to the considerations which he presents.

I desire to call attention especially to a few facts connected with this subject.

First. The appropriations for the years alluded to have been reduced much below the estimates made for the service.

Second. During a part of this time there has been absolutely returned to the Treasury out of the appropriations made for the Indian service in all its branches a sum nearly equal to the deficiency now asked for.

Third. The necessity for the excess of appropriation during the years prior to 1875 arose out of facts and circumstances mentioned by the Commissioner, over which the Department had no control, and the deficiencies thus created were rendered absolutely necessary by all the laws of humanity and economy.

Fourth. It is manifest, from the Commissioner's statement, that if these deficiencies had not been incurred, a much greater expenditure would probably have been necessary, and a great sacrifice of life involved, both among the Indian and white population.

Fifth. It may be said with justice, that the causes which led to the necessity for the deficiencies during these years were known to the President and the Secretary of the Interior, and that the administration of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in incurring such deficiencies, was substantially approved by both these officers.

In regard to the necessity for a deficiency appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1875, I invite particular attention.

It will be seen that without a deficiency appropriation for this year, it will be impossible to provide for the wants of a large body of Indians, for whose provision we are under obligation.

I must not fail to say that the economy and fidelity of the Commissioner in administering the appropriations for this year will challenge any fair criticism, however close. I do not believe any branch of the public service has been administered with greater economy, and the figures furnished by the Commissioner justify this conclusion.

The misrepresentations in regard to this subject made by interested parties, and others who are desirous of breaking down the present policy of the President, and possibly the want of full and correct information on the part of some who are its friends, justify me, I think, in this strong assertion.

I have felt it my duty to add all these reasons to what has been said by the Commissioner in favor of the deficiencies asked for, so that it may not be said that the Department has failed to lay before Congress as forcibly as possible all the facts in favor of the request now made.

Very respectfully,

C. DELANO, Secretary.

Hon. L. M. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to a subject the consideration of which I deem to be of vital importance to the public service committed to the administration of this Bureau.

On November 13, 1874, I had the honor to forward deficiency estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and prior years, amounting to $465,169.16. On January 19, 1875, I submitted a supplementary estimate, amounting to $70,618.80, for the same purpose. On December 12 and 14, 1874, I invited the attention of the Department to the necessity for additional appropriations, during the present year, for the purchase and transportation of supplies for the Sioux, amounting to $237,900. On December 21, 1874, I submitted an estimate for supplies, amounting to $175,000, required to subsist the Apaches in Arizona for the remainder the of present year ending June 30, 1875.

Of the deficiencies prior to June 30, 1874, $62,326.45 accrued prior to June 30, 1873. The estimates for these amounts failed to secure an appropriation at the last session, as did also an estimate for the deficiencies of 1874, which were known to exist, and were so reported at the last session. These deficiencies have been occasioned by inadequate appropriations. For the last three years the appropriations have fallen short of the estimates by the Department from $300,000 to $700,000 annually. They represent the aggregate of accounts which have been filed, and are admitted to be due for supplies and services actually furnished and rendered, and the failure to make the necessary appropriations will bring loss and hardship to many parties who have served the Government in good faith.

In the nature of the case, owing to the distant and widely-scattered fields of operations, and on account of the changes which are frequently occurring, against which no human foresight can provide, no other branch of the public service is so liable to exigencies which necessitate deficiencies as the Indian Bureau. But if the Bureau had not made the expenditures to meet the exigencies which have arisen in the service, loss of life, and untold damage upon the settlers in their vicinity, and warfare upon the Indians, at an expense tenfold greater than that actually incurred, would have been the result. Especially was this true during the years 1872 and 1873, in Arizona and New Mexico, when the Indians were being brought by the military upon reservations, and a corresponding increase of supplies to be purchased for them was absolutely required.

The part of the country under the ravages of the Apaches made it necessary to adopt the severest military orders respecting these Indians. They were promised by General Howard and General Crook, in the name of the President, that if they would come on reservations and remain at peace they should be fed; and that those who refused to come on, or left their reservations, should be shot. They were gathered and were fed, and this deficiency has resulted. If, in these circumstances, the Government had failed to feed them, it would have deserved the execration of mankind.

The main portion of the deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1874, was occasioned by the continued necessary expenditures in Arizona, upon the policy of feeding the Indians who were forced upon reservations by the miliary, for which an adequate provision, according to the estimates of the Department, was not made by Congress, and also by the gathering of the northern hostile Sioux at the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, who demanded rations, which the agent, being without troops, was powerless to refuse. The scanty supply of buffalo, which are rapidly disappearing from the old hunting-grounds of these Indians, drove them into these agencies, where most of them now are; and thus was created an emergency against which no foresight could have provided.

Respecting the deficiency appropriation asked for the year ending June 30, 1875. I have the honor to state that up to the present time, so far as known, there has been no expenditure beyond the amounts appropriated; but it is a fact well ascertained that the appropriations made at the last session of Congress for feeding the Sioux and Apaches, and for transporting their supplies, will not be sufficient to provide for those Indians until the end of June next.

The estimated amounts still unprovided for are:

For transportation to the Sioux	$75,000
For subsistence of Sioux at Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies	162,900
For subsistence of Apaches of Arizona	175,000

One million nine hundred and fourteen thousand pounds of goods and coffee and sugar were purchased in New York and Philadelphia, and 7,315,000 pounds of flour, corn, pork, bacon, salt, &c., were purchased in Sioux City, Omaha, and Cheyenne, in all 9,229,000 pounds of freight, required to be transported to the —— different Sioux agencies in Dakota, of which 2,830,000 pounds were required to be carried from 200 to 260 miles by wagon after reaching the end of transportation by rail and water. For this service only $98,000 was appropriated, or an average of about one cent per pound. Any one familiar with the business of freighting will see that transportation cannot be procured at such rates, and to require the Indian Bureau to perform this service on this appropriation is to require an impossibility.

The additional supplies required at Spotted Tail and Red Cloud result from the fact that the hitherto hostile Northern Sioux who gathered at these agencies during the past year were not provided for according to estimate made to Congress during the last session, and consequently have repeated the demands of last year, and have taken the rations which were provided for other Indians. There is no reasonable doubt that a failure thus to provide for this class of Indians would have driven them away to be now engaged in depredations or in open conflict with the military.

Respecting the deficiencies anticipated in Arizona, I have to say that supplies for the present year have been purchased at lower rates than ever before; that the Indians have been definitely enrolled as to numbers; and, with the exception of Cochise's band of about eight hundred, the issues have been made to them in agencies which have been within the command of officers of the Army; and that respecting no part of the Indian service have I more confidence that both the Government and the Indians have been honestly dealt with than at these agencies in Arizona during the present year. And yet the amounts appropriated by Congress, which were below the estimates, will not be sufficient to feed and provide for these Indians till the end of June next.

It is proper to furnish a memorandum of prices that are now being paid for supplies for the Sioux and Apaches:

Beef for Arizona, gross weight, at the agencies	$2.69	per 100 pounds.
Beef for the Sioux, gross weight, at the agencies	2.30 1-30	per 100 pounds.
Flour for the Sioux, except Red Cloud agency, delivered at Sioux City	2.73	per 100 pounds.
Flour for the Red Cloud agency, delivered at Cheyenne	2.50	per 100 pounds.
Flour for the several agencies in Arizona, except a small amount at Rio Verde	$5.00 to 6.65	per 100 pounds.

A comparison of the cost of these supplies with the rates paid by the military at the same points will show a large balance in favor of the Indian service.

It is also proper to state that during the last three years there has accrued to the surplus fund out of the appropriations made for this Bureau over $725,000.

The law enacted in the appropriation bill forbids the Department incurring any indebtedness beyond the amounts appropriated. Up to the present time, with the possible exception of accounts for transportation, which have not yet been rendered, no such indebtedness has been incurred within the knowledge of this office, but unless additional funds are made available for the present year the alternative before the Department is either to violate this positive enactment or to cease feeding the Sioux and the Apaches about the 1st of May next.

The latter course, if adopted, can mean nothing but pillage and Indian warfare. It will leave without food and uncared for over thirty thousand Indians, who have been compelled to come upon reservations and are ordered to be shot by the military if they leave. They certainly will not stay in hunger; many of them will escape the military and will be sure to make their living somehow by plunder among the settlements.

I cannot believe that Congress, with these statements received as facts, will hesitate to make appropriation to prevent any such disaster and cruelty. But if that body should decline to so provide, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the Department to make any further purchases, because it will be a virtual declaration by the highest authorities that no claims on account of supplies thus furnished will ever be allowed; and even if this were not true, in my judgment this case can no longer be treated by the Department as an emergency in the meaning of the law. That cannot be called an emergency which has been clearly foreseen in ample time to make provision therefor.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I offer the following amendment:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the adjusted accounts of the parties named in Executive Document No. 69, submitting estimates for the deficiency bill, due in consequence of deficiencies in the appropriations for the years 1872, 1873, and 1874, for the Indian service in the Territory of Montana, as awarded by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, $14,681.39.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a list of accounts for the payment of which this appropriation is desired. The amount in the aggregate is about $15,000. Every one of these accounts has been passed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and has been declared to be justly due by the accounting officers of the Treasury. They were all included in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury making estimates for this deficiency bill, and known as Executive Document No. 69. For some unaccountable reason, or rather from some whim, the Committee on Appropriations has omitted these items from its bill. These sums are mostly due to farmers, merchants, and laborers in Missoula County, in the Territory I have the honor to represent. Not one of the men whose claims are embraced in this paper can be called an Indian contractor. If they were Indian contractors I should not be speaking for them here; nor would it be necessary, for that class generally understand their business so well that they can carry through their claims without any aid of mine. The great contractors, sir, are rarely left behind to the tender mercies of a deficiency bill. But these poor men—farmers, laborers, hotelkeepers, and merchants—have not been paid; and it is desired to still longer refuse them payment. If your Indian agents or officers exceeded their duty and made purchases without authority or issued vouchers in excess of their appropriations, punish them, but do not victimize the people who honestly furnished the supplies or performed the labor for which these vouchers were issued. These claims range down as low as thirty and forty dollars, and have been due one, two, and in some instances three years; and justice requires that the Government should pay such debts even more promptly than it pays its larger and wealthier contractors and many others whose claims pass this House. And a Government that plumes itself on the fidelity with which it meets its pledges to its bondholders cannot afford to repudiate its acknowledged debts to these poorer men who hold its smaller vouchers.

Mr. STEELE. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says that no one talks of repudiating these debts. I answer that if we fail to appropriate the money necessary to pay them it is repudiating them. There are no means by which these people can receive the amounts due to them unless the Congress of the United States will make the necessary appropriation. Mr. Chairman, it is attempted to create the impression that the failure to make these appropriations will be no hardship. Now, sir, one of the men interested in the amendment offered by me, to the amount of $1,800—money due him by the United States and which has been due and owing him since the end of the last fiscal year—money due him for articles furnished the Government and which were cash to him, I see by the last paper received by me from home has had his property offered for sale on execution to pay debts and judgments against him, while the United States owes that man the money which, if they would pay him, might have saved him from this trouble. Sir, it is neither honest nor just in the Government to treat its citizens and creditors in this manner.

Now, sir, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says that unless Congress makes this appropriation it will be impossible to pay these men. Therefore I say, whether you expressly and honestly repudiate your debts by refusing to pay them or do it tacitly and dishonestly by failing to make provision to pay them, it amounts in the end to the same thing. It amounts to repudiation, and nothing else. If you do not make provision here to pay these just debts you will refuse to do what the Indian Department has reported that you ought to do. You will refuse to pay demands which your own Treasury Department has audited and passed and certified to this House to be proper and just. You will fail to pay debts that you are in duty bound to pay, and fail to do what common honesty commands that you do.

Sir, these claims are honest and just; no man has risen here, and no man can rise here and say that one dollar of these claims is unjust or dishonest. There has been no robbery in any of these items; there are no large items. They are no claims of large contractors, but the honest demands of honest men against the Government. There are no millions involved in this appropriation, but perhaps if there were millions involved in it there would not be so much difficulty in obtaining payment.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this House will have the courage and honesty to make the necessary appropriations to pay the honest and just debts of the Government to its own citizens.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the adjusted accounts of parties named in Executive Document No. 69, due in consequence of deficiencies in the appropriations for the years 1872, 1873, and 1874, for the Indian service in the Territory of Utah, as awarded by the accounting officers of the Treasury, $10,113.94.

Mr. CANNON, of Utah. Mr. Chairman, this comprises the same class of cases as those which have been described by the gentleman from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK,] the gentleman from Wyoming, [Mr. STEELE,] and the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.] It is to pay for labor done for the Government. It is to pay laborers upon Indian farms, for furnishing beef, for merchandise, and for other necessary articles supplied to the Indians. These expenditures were necessary to enable the Indian agents to carry on their business successfully, and these men ought to be compensated for the labor which they have done and for the goods which they have furnished to these agents of the Government. It would be the greatest hardship to the people to whom these amounts are due if this appropriation should not be agreed to at this time. I know it is a small amount, but nevertheless it is one which will do immeasurable good to those who are interested in getting what is due them. I know myself many of these debts to be due. I know some of the parties who have given credit to the Department. I also know that it was expected in good faith at this session of Congress an appropriation would be inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill to cover all these items. It is a small amount, as I have said, but it is to pay debts due and which ought to be paid without further delay.

Mr. MCCORMICK. The House should know that beyond the gross injustice to creditors of the Government which must result from a failure to make the appropriation for deficiencies for the last fiscal year, there is a probability that if one is not made to provide supplies for the remainder of the present year the Indians now upon reservations must starve or go upon raids of robbery and murder, to quell which will cost vastly more than all the money now asked by the Interior Department.

I call upon gentlemen upon this floor who have advocated the "peace policy" to prove their faith in it by giving appropriations to sustain it. They should not talk in one way and act in another. They must know that Indians cannot be kept quiet upon fine words and smooth promises. They must know that the responsibility of this whole business rests right here much more than with any Department, and that it is a responsibility which those who profess to desire peace upon the frontier cannot escape.

If the "peace policy" is the policy of the Government, the Government should not be the first to complain of its cost and to expose to embarrassment and loss those who endeavor in good faith to carry it out. If it is an expensive policy that is no fault of the people of the frontier, and ought to have been considered before it was adopted and made an Administration measure.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian office:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary to make up the deficiency in the general appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, for transportation of supplies provided for the Sioux Indians under treaty of April 29, 1868, including the Santee Sioux, the Yankton Sioux, and the Poncas, $75,000.

Mr. SHANKS. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, to be paid to the Seminole Nation of Indians for the difference between the amount paid by the United States and the Creeks for the reservation now occupied by the Seminoles by treaty of June 14, 1866, and the amount deducted for the same from the money due them for their former territory ceded to the United States by treaty of March 25, 1838, $40,000; the same to be appropriated as follows: one-half to be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to the payment of the present debts of the Seminole Nation, and the balance to be paid to said Indians per capita in the same way as annuities are paid.

Mr. SHANKS. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOWE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 485 insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, with the consent of the citizen class of Pottawatomie Indians, to sell not exceeding $20,000 worth of their bonds now held in trust by him, and to apply the proceeds of such sale in the purchase of subsistence, seeds, and agricultural implements, and for other beneficial objects for said Pottawatomies.

Mr. LOWE. I offer this at the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For the balance still due the confederated tribes of the Kaskaskias, Peorias, Weas, and Piankeshaws, arising from the sale of their "trust lands" by William Brindle, late receiver of public moneys at Lecompton, Kansas, $1,209.88.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. This has been put into another bill and has got into this bill by mistake.

Mr. LOWE. That is right.

The motion to strike out the paragraph was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LOWE] just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay deficiencies for expenses contracted by the special commissioners, Powell and Ingles, in the removal of Pi-Ute Indians in 1873 and 1874, as by letter of Commissioner on Indian Affairs and books of said office, $15,935.83.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness that may be due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund, arising under the provisions of the treaty with the Creek Nation of March 24, 1832, whereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue United States 5 per cent. registered bonds, with interest accruing on the same from July 1, 1874, and which said bonds shall be held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior, who may, at the request of the said orphans or their legal representatives, cause the same to be converted into money, to be applied for the benefit of the Creek orphans of 1832, or their legal heirs and representatives, in accordance with the provisions of said treaty, in such sums and at such times as may be required: Provided, That no part of said money herein provided for shall be paid or delivered until the Creek council shall, by act duly passed, and a certified copy thereof filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, certifying by name and amounts severally the persons entitled thereto, as such orphans, or their legal heirs, to whom it shall be severally paid: And provided further, That any excess that shall remain of said fund, after paying said orphans and heirs as hereinbefore provided, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be retained by the Government of the United States for the purposes of refunding to the Treasury of the United States the amount paid to and for certain loyal Creek refugees in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress, approved February 22, 1862; and that, further, any balance of said fund shall be placed in the treasury of the Creek Nation, and become a common fund of said Creek Nation, and become a national fund, to be used by them as they may in council determine: And provided further, That no officer of the Government of the United shall either entertain, recognize, or pay to any claim agent, attorney, or pretended attorney, any fee or compensation for any services rendered, or pretended to have been rendered, in the presentation of this claim.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment. This is the old Creek claims affair, which is older than I am, and has been here in Congress seeking to be passed as a bill ever since I have been here. But it has never been offered in an appropriation bill, because it is acknowledged everywhere that if passed at all it must be passed as a claim before it can be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. ELKINS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 504 add the following:

For this amount of the deficiency in the incidental expenses in Indian service, Territory of New Mexico, $50,000, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter of January 8, 1875.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. There is no point of order in it. What is the gentleman's point of order? On what ground does he object?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no appropriation for this purpose, and there is no precedent for voting a deficiency in such a case.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from New Mexico what legislation there is supporting this amendment?

Mr. ELKINS. There is no legislation in it.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Then it is subject to the point of order. A deficiency is in the nature of supplying an appropriation already made. A deficiency appropriation must be predicated on existing legislation, and the same rule applies in my judgment to a deficiency that belongs to the original appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. ELKINS. May I submit a remark? This is a deficiency to supply a want in an appropriation heretofore made by Congress for this purpose. It is in the line of the bill. It is exactly in accordance with other deficiencies asked for in this bill, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury to supply a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it predicated on existing law?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Where is the law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I know of no appropriation heretofore made of which this is to supply a deficiency.

Mr. ELKINS. Here is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending that this amount be allowed and asking Congress to pass the deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. This paragraph may be passed over until the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations ascertains whether there is any law warranting the amendment.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask that the letter may be read.

Mr. CONGER. If this is to supply a deficiency in an appropriation already made, is it not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says he does not so understand it. It will be informally passed over until the chairman of the committee ascertains the fact, the point of order on the amendment being reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

To pay to internal-revenue collectors, assessors, and other internal-revenue officers their salaries, commissions, and expenses allowed by law, as have been or may be ascertained and certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department; and to pay such further allowances as have been or may be granted to such collectors and assessors by the Secretary of the Treasury, in lieu of such salaries and commissions; and to pay miscellaneous expenses of carrying into effect the various provisions of the several acts providing for internal revenue, being for the service of the ten years ending June 30, 1872, $200,000.

Mr. SHELDON. I offer the following amendment to come in after that paragraph:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, in the settlement of the accounts of E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of the fifth district of Virginia, to audit and allow such amounts as are shown to have been stolen or embezzled by his late deputy collector R. W. Hobson, it first having been proven to the satisfaction of the Treasurer that such embezzlement or losses did not occur through any fault or negligence of said Pendleton: Provided, That in case any of the money so stolen or embezzled shall be recovered the same shall inure to the benefit of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay such claims for services rendered and expenses incurred in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating internal-revenue laws, or conniving at the same, as have been or may be allowed and certified by the proper officers of the Treasury Department, as provided by law, being for the service of the five years ending June 30, 1872, $20,000.

Mr. STRAIT. I offer the following amendment:

That the provisions contained in the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes," limiting the compensation to be allowed for the disbursement of moneys appropriated for the construction of any public building was intended and shall be deemed and held to limit the compensation to be allowed to any disbursing officer who disburses moneys appropriated for and expended in the construction of any public building as aforesaid to ½ of 1 per cent. for said services.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are unanimously in favor of this amendment regulating the pay and allowances of the disbursing agents on the erection of public buildings. I do not know that there is any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHELDON. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the one just adopted:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to give John S. Chapman, late collector of internal revenue for the second district in the State of Louisiana, credit in the settlement of his official accounts for the sum of $900 taxes collected, which was lost or stolen while in course of transmittal, in a registered letter, through the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I raise the point of order on that amendment, and object to it until I can hear something further in regard to it.

Mr. SHELDON. This amendment is unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is a case where this man's accounts have been settled and where this loss clearly occurred through default on the part of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. It is a claim like every other claim on the Calendar, and I insist on the point of order on it.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SHELDON] is mistaken in saying that it is unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHELDON. I was not aware that there was any objection to it.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. It is like every other claim on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

To pay claims of officers and enlisted men of the regular Army for back pay that may be due them on pay-rolls, final accounts, and Treasury certificates, being for the service of the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $23,711.75.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have a report to make to the House from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I think it important that it should be acted on promptly and at this time. I move, therefore, that the committee rise, in order that when we get into the House I can have an opportunity to present that report.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, pursuant to the order of the House, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

HORACE MAYNARD,
CHARLES O'NEILL,
JAMES C. ROBINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

LOT M. MORRILL,
GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Ordinarily I should ask the action of the House upon the report as submitted, and that another conference be asked. But this is the fourth conference we have had upon this bill. It is proper, therefore, and I beg the indulgence of the House while I do so, to make a statement somewhat in detail as to the exact points of difference between the two Houses.

As this bill passed the House originally it contained provisions for the payment of clerks and other employés of the Senate, and for the payment of clerks and other employés of the House. When the bill went to the Senate that body thought proper, on the one hand, to increase the pay that we had designated for their clerks and employés, and on the other to strike down the pay we had fixed for our clerks and employés—and notably, and let me have the attention of the House to this—the pay of the Chief Clerk and the journal clerk of the House, the pay of the two reading clerks, of the tally clerk, and of the assistant journal clerk, and also the pay of our stenographers for committees.

Upon going into conference the conferees on the part of the House expressed themselves content to allow the Senate to adjust the pay of their employés as they might think proper. The Senate conferees, however, as I understood, expressed a willingness to recede from the increase which they had voted for their employés, but they were not willing to recede from their amendments by which they struck down the pay that we had fixed for our employés.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. What reason do they give for that?

Mr. MAYNARD. I know of no reason excepting that they thought it was too much. I will remark here that the sums which we fixed are the same that appeared in the appropriation bill of last year; that is, for the Chief Clerk and the journal clerk $3,600 each, as long as the present officers are incumbents; and for the assistant journal clerk, the tally clerk, and the two reading clerks, $3,000 each. The Senate struck down those amounts, for the first two clerks to $3,000 each, and for the others to $2,592, the same amount that we pay to the other assistant clerks and to the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

After discussion, however, the Senate conferees submitted to us a proposition which they authorized us to report to the House. It is that they are willing to recede from their amendments so far as the Chief Clerk and the journal clerk of the House are concerned, but expect and require us to give up with respect to their amendments concerning the two reading clerks, the tally clerk, and the assistant journal clerk. The conferees on the part of the House did not feel authorized to agree to that, and therefore we have disagreed in the conference.

I have thought it proper to state the precise point at issue: Shall we adhere to the sums which we have indicated as in our judgment only adequate to the payment of the officials I have named, or shall we recede and agree to pay them the sums indicated by the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. RANDALL. Have you ever known the Senate to undertake before to fix the compensation of the clerks and employés of the House?

Mr. BECK. How many conferences have been had on this bill?

Mr. MAYNARD. We have had four conferences. I suppose the only method by which we can obtain an expression of the opinion of the House is for me to submit a motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Before the gentleman does that allow me to ask him a question. Did the same point come up in this last conference that came up in the previous conferences; and has that point prevented the accord between the two bodies?

Mr. MAYNARD. Precisely the same question, except that in this conference the conferees on the part of the Senate agreed to concede the sums that we have designated as the salaries of the chief clerk and the journal clerk, but requires us to recede from the sums that we designated as the salaries of the other clerks.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The only point that has defeated all the conferences has been in reference to the pay of the clerks?

Mr. MAYNARD, That is the only point. There were one or two other minor officers of the House, the assistant postmaster whose pay is reduced, and our telegraphic operator whose pay is reduced, and our two stenographers of committees whose pay we fixed at $5,000, and the Senate proposes to reduce it to $4,200.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is nothing else in the whole bill, but what they agree to?

Mr. MAYNARD. Nothing else, I belive.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We ought to get this bill through as soon as possible, because it is now less than twenty-four hours from the close of the session.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think we ought never to submit to the dictation of the Senate. It is a question of right and of proper dignity, and we ought never to submit.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] tell us that we must either accede to the demands of the Senate or lose this bill?

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not so stated; I am not authorized so to state.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to risk the loss of the bill. I would give up almost anything else rather than do that.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no great danger of that; I think I may say, no danger. The Senate has now receded half way; and if we stand firm, I think that body will take the remaining step backward.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But suppose they do not.

Mr. KELLOGG. What is now the difference between the two Houses

Mr. RANDALL. Only $1,600.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the House insist on its disagreement and ask another conference with the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House recede from its disagreement upon the point in question. The amendment upon which the Senate insists merely puts these salaries back to where we put them ourselves by the act repealing the salary-increasing features of the act of March 3, 1873.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think we had better stand by the law that has been last passed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, there were ayes 32, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Would it be in order to move that, if the House insists, the same conferees shall be appointed.

The SPEAKER. If the House should again insist, the Chair, having within his discretion the appointment of conferees, would appoint the same gentlemen making this report.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the Senate conferees have already receded in part.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MAYNARD, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reappoints the same conferees.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill which has been approved by the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Company."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all duties, powers, and authority in the act of May 20, 1870, entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Company," imposed and conferred upon the mayor and common council of the city of Washington, or upon the mayor and alderman of said city, shall be imposed and conferred upon, and may be exercised by, the executive department of the District of Columbia for the time being, or the senior officer thereof, or the chief justice of the supreme judicial court of said District.

SEC. 2. That the right of any occupant who may hereafter occupy any stalls or stands, to the possession thereof, shall be regarded as his personal property, subject to revert to the said market company on non-payment of the advance monthly rent or any amount due for use and occupation, to be paid on the last secular day of the preceding month; and on the non-payment of the advance monthly rent or amount due for use and occupation, the said company shall be entitled, at any time thereafter, on demand, on the premises, of payment of the amount due and unpaid, to re-enter upon and repossess the said premises; and on refusal or neglect of the said occupant to vacate and deliver up the said premises, the market company shall have relief under the second section of the act entitled "An act to regulate proceedings between landlords and tenants in the District of Columbia," approved July 4, 1864.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that there is no particular objection to the bill except that the words "who may hereafter occupy" should be changed to read "who may hereafter rent." With that modification I do not object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the modification.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof; and the bill (H. R. No. 4862) was passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY BAND.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order in Committee of the Whole to offer the following as an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill:

That the Military Academy band shall consist of one teacher of music, who shall be leader of the band, and may be a civilian, and of forty enlisted musicians of the band; that the teacher of music shall receive ninety dollars per month, one ration, and the allowance of fuel of a second lieutenant of the Army; and that of the enlisted musicians of the band, ten shall each be paid thirty-four dollars per month, and the remaining thirty shall each be paid thirty dollars per month; and that the enlisted musicians of the band shall have the benefits as to pay arising from re-enlistments and length of service applicable to other enlisted men of the Army.

This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs after investigating the subject, and the measure has been recommended by two Boards of Visitors to the Military Academy.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent that this may be offered in Committee of the Whole as an amendment to the deficiency bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move to suspend the rules to make the proposition in order.

The motion was agreed to; there being ayes 97, noes not counted.

SURETIES OF DAVID L. STANTON.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to suspend the rules so that it shall be in order in Committee of the Whole to offer as an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill the following, which has been approved by the Committee on Ways and Means:

That John T. Ensor, Zephaniah Poteet, and the other sureties of David L. Stanton, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, by bond to the United States dated April 24, 1869, be, and they are hereby, released from their said liability arising from any defalcation of the said David L. Stanton as such collector; and the proper officer of the Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to dismiss any and all suits that may have been instituted and are now pending in favor of the United States against the sureties aforesaid growing out of the default of the said collector.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust there will be no objection. I will explain it when it comes to be voted on in committee.

The rules were suspended, and the amendment made in order to the deficiency appropriation bill.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be now suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the deficiency appropriation bill, (Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.)

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I move to insert the following at the end of line 63, page 26.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to make such transfer in the accounts of his Department for the current fiscal year as may be necessary by reason of the changes of the post-offices in the newly annexed part of the city of New York to the stations of the New York City post-office.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that amendment, but it should come in at the end of the post-office section.

Mr. POTTER. That is where it is proposed to be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order reserved is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Mexico, [Mr. ELKINS.] The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken. The amendment embraces items covered by law, and are therefore legitimately in the deficiency appropriation bill. The Clerk will again read the amendment of the gentleman from New Mexico.

The Clerk read as follows:

For this amount for the deficiency in the incidental expenses of the Indian service in New Mexico, as an additional deficiency in the deficiency bill approved June 22, 1874, $50,000, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter of January 8, 1875, to the House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. I wish to know what that amendment is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that I cannot see any merit in appropriating $50,000 for New Mexico or any other Territory when there has been no estimate sent in to the Committee on Appropriations, no request bearing on this, no demand from the proper Department asking for the insertion of any such appropriation. It is only swelling this deficiency appropriation bill to please this, that, or the other gentleman.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He is mistaken in the statement he has just made, as this deficiency is not only asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury, but also by the Secretary of the Interior, and by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The items covered by my amendment are embraced in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 8, 1875, to the House of Representatives. There are items embraced as low as $14, and so on up to $100 and $120; none higher than $2,000. This appropriation is to pay for vouchers about which there is and can be no question. The vouchers have been approved by the Indian Department. I challenge any gentleman upon this floor to state any good and valid objection to any of them. They are due and ought to be paid, and it is necessary to make this appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the Delegate from New Mexico mean to say that this $50,000 is an aggregation of a great many small claims?

Mr. ELKINS. It is; and here are the items set forth in detail in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is nothing in the language of the gentleman's amendment to identify them. I say there has been no request sent to the Committee on Appropriations to make this appropriation of $50,000. In the amendment offered and now pending there is no limitation whatever. If the gentleman means that it is an aggregation of all these smaller items why did he not say so?

Mr. ELKINS. It does say so.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; he has left that out.

Mr. ELKINS. The amendment states that it is in accordance with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 8, 1875. It also has been recommended by the Department of the Interior under the law for the payment of incidental expenses of the Indian service in New Mexico. Here are the items; many very small, running down as low, as I have said, to $14. I do not wish to specify all these items in detail in the amendment. It is not necessary. I think the amendment is sufficiently explicit. Now, does the gentleman from Ohio wish to repudiate the action of the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Department? These are just and legal debts contracted by the Government, and ought to be paid. There can be no question about that whatever. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen's time has expired.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentlemen from New Mexico.

Mr. ELKINS. I will yield to the gentleman from Arizona to ask me a question.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me ask the gentleman from New Mexico, whether, in his judgment, there would be any need for appropriations to supply these deficiencies if the appropriation asked for by the Department were made in accordance with their carefully-prepared estimates and not cut down as they have been?

Mr. ELKINS. If the appropriations were made as asked for by the Department there would be no necessity to ask for this appropriation to supply deficiencies.

Now I do not see the necessity or the reason for inviting proposals and asking people to furnish beef, corn, and other supplies to the Indian Department and then after they have been supplied to the Government refusing to make appropriation to pay for them. They are debts due by the Government, and are sanctioned by the pledge of the faith of the Government. The gentleman from Ohio need not wave his hands and say there is nothing to authorize this. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I have said, has recommended the appropriation. The Indian Department has the vouchers on file and payment ought to be made, for the Government has received ample consideration. These vouchers are held by poor people for small amounts for goods which they have supplied. No one appears here to urge their claims upon this floor save a humble Delegate who, with a voteless voice, appeals to the House in their behalf that simple justice be done them.

The action of the committee in refusing to allow these deficiencies is in effect a repudiation of the just debts of the Government, and the House should be tardy in committing the country to this outrage, which cannot be justified on any theory.

It is said the Department exceeded the appropriation. This may be the case; but I submit if it is just for the Government, through its highest officer, the Secretary of the Interior, to purchase supplies from the people of the frontier, use the same in the interest of the public service, and then refuse payment because the appropriation may not have been sufficient. An officer armed with the commission of the Government is entitled to the confidence of the people; and they have a right to believe that his acts will be respected.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 74.

Mr. ELKINS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. ELKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay claims of officers and enlisted men of the volunteer service, or their heirs and assigns, for arrears of pay that may be certified to be due them by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, being for the service of the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $597,428.40.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move after the word "pay," in line 65, to insert "or balance."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a statement and a request. All from page 26 forward to the end of the section on the thirty-third page is simply to authorize the continuation of old matters and there is no new appropriation out of the Treasury in any of them. I desire to make a verbal correction on the thirty-third page, and then I will ask the committee to dispense with the reading of the rest of that section.

To make that correction I offer the following amendment:

In line 234 strike out "$10,000;" and insert "$20,000;" so the paragraph will read:
For payment of unsettled claims now pending before the Department for defraying expenses of United States courts, being for the service of the fiscal year 1871 and prior years, $20,000.

The following letter from the Treasury Department explains the necessity of this amendment:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE.
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1875.

SIR: In December last I requested the Secretary of the Treasury to apply for a reappropriation of $10,000 to defray expenses of pending claims against the judiciary fund, which accrued prior to July 1, 1871. Since then additional claims have come in, and I have now to request that you will please change the amount from $10,000 to $20,000. If there be a surplus it will of course be covered to the credit of the surplus fund.

Among the claims presented is one amounting to $1,300 from Francis L. Dalton, late United States marshal for the eastern district of New York. It has not yet been examined.

Very respectfully,

WM. HEMPHILL JONES,
Acting Comptroller.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the reading of the bill from page 26 to page 33 was dispensed with.

Here the committee informally rose.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 420) to amend an act entitled "An act for the restoration to homestead entry and to market of certain lands in Michigan," approved June 10, 1872, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4861) granting a pension to Louis Heinley;

An act (H. R. No. 4857) extending the privilege of the Library of Congress to the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

An act (H. R. No. 4820) authorizing the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company to straighten the line of their road;

An act (H. R. No. 4840) for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4850) authorizing the appointment of gaugers for the customs service at the port of Philadelphia.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to offer an additional section, to be inserted on page 33, what I send to the desk. I understand that this is offered with the sanction of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay the sum of $19,200 in gold, or its equivalent in legal tender notes, in pursuance of a judgment in favor of Edward Mesnard against the brigantine Scylla, her tackle, apparel, and cargo, (No. 7903,) rendered on the 11th day of May, A. D. 1866, in the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, for the restoration of the said brigantine Scylla, her tackle, apparel, and cargo, and $13,200 in gold; of which said judgment Charles W. Adams, of New York, is the assignee and owner, and also, the sum of $6,000 in gold, taken from said Adams: Provided, That before such payment shall be made the said assignee shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury a full discharge of said judgment for said gold, in duplicate, and also a receipt in full for the sum of $6,000 in gold, delivered by him to Captain John L. Routt, assistant quartermaster United States Army, on or about the 30th day of January, A. D. 1864.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. This money has been in the Treasury since 1864.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It has been subjected to an investigation by the Committee on War Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is a violation of all decency to keep this man's money.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. NIBLACK. I got leave of the House to offer an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana in a moment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as an additional section the following:
To enable the Department of Justice to settle with and pay to John G. Hosmer, late sheriff of Cayuga County, New York, the disbursements and rewards paid in the capture of the notorious counterfeiter Thomas Ballard, $338.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as an additional section the following:
The commissioners of the District of Columbia shall pay the salary of the surveyor of the District, at the rate of $2,000 per year from the 20th of June, 1874, and $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated therefor.

Mr. SPEER. Is that authorized by law? If not, I raise the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is a deficiency.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does it not increase the salary?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. SPEER. Does not existing law provide for this compensation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will hear the letter of the District engineer read, I think he will not object.

Mr. SPEER. I will hear the letter, reserving my point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER'S OFFICE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 18, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to return herewith communications of Hon. N. P. CHIPMAN and William Forsyth relative to the restoration of the salary of the surveyor of the District.

The present organization of the surveyor's office is adequate to the performance of the duties of the same. The entire force of the office is paid by the District government with the exception of the surveyor himself, who receives no salary. It would be difficult to organize this office in such a manner as to separate the work done for the benefit of the general public, and for which fees are receivable, from that which is constantly demanded by the District government, and for that reason the commissioners have maintained the entire office force.

It seems to me an exceptional economy that limits the compensation of the surveyor to his fees and the incidental benefit of the use of this office force.

I recommend he be recognized as a District officer, inasmuch as he acts in that capacity, and is subject to the orders of the engineer by direction of the commissioners, and that his original salary be allowed him less 20 per cent., the reduction ordered by Congress in the case of other officers and employés.

He should be required to make periodical returns of all fees collected by him, and on what account. These returns can be made the basis of any future modification of his salary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. L. HOXIE,
Lieutenant Engineers, U. S. A., and Engineer of District of Columbia.

Hon. COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask whether the compensation provided by this amendment is the same previously paid by the District for the same service?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. Then I withdraw my point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to offer the following amendment. It does not contain any appropriation, but provides for an adjustment of accounts. I offer it as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized in the settlement of the accounts of John L. Smith, late Indian agent for the Ottawas, now deceased, to consider and adjust the same on the best evidence accessible to them, allowing such credits as may seem just and equitable with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I offer the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. That the Military Academy band shall consist of one teacher of music, who shall be leader of the band, and may be a civilian, and of forty enlisted musicians of the band.

SEC. —. That the teacher of music shall receive ninety dollars per month, one ration, and the allowance of fuel of a second lieutenant of the Army; and that of the enlisted musicians of the band ten shall each be paid thirty-four dollars per month, and the remaining thirty shall each be paid thirty dollars per month; and that the enlisted musicians of the band shall have the benefits as to pay arising from re-enlistments and length of service applicable to other enlisted men of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division on that amendment.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 39.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a quorum?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a quorum; does the gentleman insist on a further count?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we should not pass an amendment like this increasing the pay of officers without a quorum; but in view of the action of the Committee of the Whole heretofore, I will not insist on a further count.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following amendment to come in after line 87 on page 27:

For pay of superintendent of the building occupied by the Subsistence Department, at No. 17 Madison Place, Washington City, District of Columbia, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I offer the following amendment, which I was authorized to offer under a suspension of the rules:

SEC. —. That John T. Ensor, Zephaniah Poteet, and the other sureties of David L. Stanton, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Maryland, by bond to the United States dated April 24, 1869, be, and they are hereby, released from their said liability arising from any defalcation of the said David L. Stanton as such collector; and the proper officer of the Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to dismiss any and all suits that may have been instituted and are now pending in favor of the United States against the sureties aforesaid growing out of the default of the said collector.

I wish to say that this amendment has been considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and they found it a case of merit, and that there is an urgency for its passage now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I have an amendment to offer from the Committee on Naval Affairs which is of the same nature as the one which has been offered by the Committee on Military Affairs. It does not add one dollar of expense; it only gives the man rank who now holds a position. It is as follows:

SEC. —. And that one additional professor of mathematics for the Navy be authorized to be appointed by the President, by and with consent of the Senate.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RAINEY. I offer the following amendment:

SEC.—. And to pay the claim of Walter D. Plowden, for services to the Government during the war, as scout and spy, under Generals Hunter and Saxton, in South Carolina, in 1863, 1864, 1865, $4,000.

Mr. SPEER. Has that amendment been made in order? If not, I raise the question of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which changes existing law. I have just received a telegram from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the change in the tax bill in the tax on whisky from 70 to 90 cents a gallon makes it necessary to change one of the sections of the Revised Statutes. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment and then I will have read the telegram from the Commissioner.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That section 3309 of the Revised Statutes be so amended that the word "seventy," whenever it occurs in the same, shall be stricken out and the word "ninety" substituted therefor.

Mr. DAWES. That is a section in reference to capacity of still. The telegram of the Commissioner to me is in these words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT. 3.

Hon. H. L. DAWES:

Could you add an amendment as follows to some bill:

That the word "seventy," wherever it occurs in section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, be changed to "ninety."

This may be of great importance to the Government interest in view of the new tax bill.

J. W. DOUGLASS.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, Mr. NIBLACK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4840) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the rules be so suspended that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, and that the same be reported to the House with the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and passed with those amendments.

Mr. SPEER. Will that prevent a separate vote on the amendments?

Mr. GARFIELD. It will; but I cannot get it out of committee in any other way without having it piled up with amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect of that motion is to cut off all separate votes on the amendments.

Mr. CESSNA. Yes; it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. So many amendments are pending to the bill that it is perfectly manifest it will be buried under the weight of amendments unless it is got out of committee in some way. We have gone over all the paragraphs of the bill in Committee of the Whole. It is now too late to delay final and positive action on the bill; it must be sent to the Senate. It will save not only time, but the public money, to adopt the motion which I now submit, that the rules be suspended, the Committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the bill passed as amended in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. Cannot the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] so modify his motion as to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of this bill and have it reported to the House for action? There are not a great many amendments upon which separate votes will be asked.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot do that.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded upon a division—ayes 129, noes 25.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 123, noes 27.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: Did a quorum vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on this most extraordinary motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being but twenty in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House order the printing of this bill forthwith as passed.

The motion was agreed to.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. POTTER. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due, and are hereby tendered, to Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the impartiality, efficiency, and distinguished ability with which he has discharged the trying and arduous duties of his office during the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. BECK. I second that resolution.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HOSKINS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended for the purpose of going to the Speaker's table and concurring in the Senate amendments to House bill No. 435, to enable the people of Colorado Territory to form a State government, and House bill No. 2418, to enable the people of New Mexico to form a State government.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I desire the House to take up a resolution reported from the Committee on Elections to seat a contestant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a motion now pending to suspend the rules.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not been willing to antagonize the appropriation bills; but as the last appropriation bill has been passed, I now ask the House to take up the resolution in the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback. It will not require more than fifteen minutes to dispose of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to suspend the rules takes precedence. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS.]

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, there being upon a division—ayes 110, noes 66.

The question was upon suspending the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 50 in the affirmative.

Mr. BECK. Can there be a division of the resolution, so that we can vote upon each Territory separately?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated, and it cannot be divided.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The resolution is to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of concurring in the amendments of the Senate. Can we go to the Speaker's table and concur?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is adopted it passes the bills.

Mr. MERRIAM. I rise to a question of order. Is this proposition so framed that we must by one vote decide upon the admission of both these Territories?

The SPEAKER. That is the form of the proposition.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The amendments of the Senate have not been read.

The SPEAKER. That is really not required, because this is a motion to suspend the rules. That motion is very sweeping. The Chair will state, however, that the effect of the amendment is to change the date of admission.

Mr. MCKEE. The only change is a postponement of the admission of these States till 1877.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 84, not voting 39, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Berry, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Caulfield, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Scudder, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Tyner, Wheeler, White, Wilber, Wolfe, and Wood—39.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. HOSKINS was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call up the report of the Committee on Ways and Means on the Pacific Mail investigation.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will be modified by inserting half past seven instead of eight o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say a word about the time for meeting this evening. There is an unusual pressure upon the clerks in engrossing or enrolling bills that have been already acted upon; and it is almost impossible for them to keep up with the current business. I hope we shall take a recess until eight o'clock.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired the House will come to order. The House adjourned with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] on the floor asking for action to be taken on the resolutions reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to the Pacific Mail subsidy.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to raise a question of privilege, or rather a question of consideration, on the report from the Committee on Elections in reference to the contest between Sheridan and Pinchback, candidates for the State at large in the State of Louisiana. That report has been before the House and is of the highest privilege known to the House. I move now to take the resolutions reported from the Committee on Elections for action at this time.

Mr. KASSON. I was on the floor, to move to suspend the rules and I do not think I can be taken off the floor in that way.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is not of so high a privilege as that of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. KASSON. I am aware the gentleman from Tennessee has waived it before for other things. What I ask to be taken up and acted on at this time will not give rise to any debate, and it ought to be disposed of at once.

Mr. HARRISON. If it be understood that I can have the floor afterward, and what the gentleman desires to call up will give rise to no debate, I do not know that I shall object.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I rise to a still higher question of privilege, to submit the report of the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] rises to a question of the highest privilege, and the Clerk will read the report of the conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 5821, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 26, 31, 32, 33, 34, 57, 58, and 59.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 27, 35, 49, 51, and 54.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words proposed to be inserted and insert in lieu thereof the word "for," and after the following words "one hundred" insert the word "fifty;" so it will read "four hundred and fifty thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof "fifteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: "Strike out the word 'twenty' and insert in lieu thereof the word 'ten,' and at the end of said amendment insert the words 'which shall be available at once.'"

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows; "Strike out the last word of said amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the words 'reduced to one thousand acres, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and in such manner as not to include the claim of any settler or minor;'" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: "In lieu of the word 'fifty' insert the word 'forty-five;'" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: "Strike out the entire paragraph;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the thirty-ninth amendment of the Senate; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the forty-first and forty-fourth amendments of the House; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: "At the end of said amendment add the following: 'And the United States assistant treasurer at Saint Louis, Missouri, be, and he hereby is, authorized to open and keep accounts with the duly-constituted treasurer of the Cherokee, Creek, Choctaw, and Chickasaw Nations of Indians, the same as with Government agents and disbursing officers;'" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80; and agree to the same; so that it shall read "$1,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 80; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84; and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 65; and agree to the same.

WILLIAM WINDOM,
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
J. W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM LOUGHRIDGE,
J. C. PARKER,
JOHN HANCOCK,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 523) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas M. Jones, of Virginia; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that body had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government.

The message further announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate thereto, agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed as managers of said conference on its part Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. THURMAN.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a resolution authorizing the Committee on Enrolled Bills to correct the title of the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands, so that the title will read, "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

PACIFIC MAIL SUBSIDY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] desires the attention of the House to a report from the Committee on Ways and Means on the subject of the Pacific Mail subsidy.

Mr. KASSON. I merely desire to have the resolutions reported by the committee read, to be acted on without debate and probably without a division.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Speaker decided that I cannot call up the resolutions of the Committee on Elections in the Louisiana election case?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist on obtaining the floor before the report of the Committee on Ways and Means is acted on?

Mr. HARRISON. If it is understood that the resolutions from the Committee on Elections shall be taken up after the other matter is disposed of, I shall give way.

Mr. CROOKE. Is it in order to object to the gentleman from Iowa making the report from the Committee on Ways and Means? If it is, I object.

The SPEAKER. It will require the suspension of the rules.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROOKE] will not object to that report.

Mr. CROOKE. I must disappoint any such hope. I must and do object.

Mr. KASSON. I renew, then, the motion that I made before the adjournment, to suspend the rules and pass the resolutions which I report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a copy of the testimony taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service be delivered to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be by him laid before the House at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, to the end that they may make further inquiry and take due action upon the questions affecting William S. King and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER, and further proceed thereon as they shall deem just.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia a copy of the evidence taken before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the question of a corrupt use of money to procure the passage of an act providing for an additional subsidy for the China mail service, with direction to lay so much of the same as relates to the truth of the testimony given by William S. King and JOHN G. SCHUMAKER before the grand jury of said District for such action as the law seems to require.

Resolved, That any reporter or correspondent having a seat in the gallery by permission of the Speaker, who has received any fee, bribe, or reward in connection with any legislation pending in either House of Congress, should be deprived of such privilege; and such conduct as disclosed before the Committee on Ways and Means is severely censured by the House.

Mr. CROOKE. I am asked what is my objection to the report? My objection is that it is an outrage on law and common sense to send that to the grand jury as evidence which is no evidence at all.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution, there were—ayes 92, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KASSON and Mr. CROOKE were appointed.

Before the vote by tellers was completed—

Mr. CROOKE said: I do not insist on further count.

So the rules were suspended (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) and the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. KASSON. There is another part of the report on which I shall ask the action of the House, after the business reported by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRISON] is disposed of.

CURRENCY.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported adversely on the following bills; and the same were laid on the table and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 3834) to substitute United States notes for the issues of national banking associations; and

The bill (H. R. No. 4377) to provide for the retirement of the national-bank notes and the substitution in lieu thereof of Treasury notes and the reduction of the interest on the public debt.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TREMAIN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, which is according to precedent:

Resolved, That the committees of this House who have reports in readiness upon matters referred to them be permitted to deliver such reports to the Clerk of the House, and that they be printed: Provided, Such reports are filed with the Clerk before the expiration of this Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask that by unanimous consent Senate bill No. 1230 be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

LOUISIANA ELECTION—STATE AT LARGE.

Mr. HARRISON. I decline to yield further. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback was not elected a member of Congress from Louisiana from the State at large in the Forty-third Congress.

Resolved, That George A. Sheridan was duly elected a member of Congress for the State at large from the State of Louisiana, in the Forty-third Congress, and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first resolution reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was next on agreeing to the second resolution; and was decided in the affirmative—ayes 121, noes 29.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE A. SHERIDAN appeared at the bar of the House and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the law of July 11, 1862.

LOUISIANA ELECTION—LAWRENCE VS. SYPHER.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I call up the resolutions reported by the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case of Lawrence vs. Sypher, first congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. There is one now pending of the highest privilege. The Clerk will read the resolutions reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That J. Hale Sypher was not elected a member of the Forty-third Congress from the first district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Effingham Lawrence was duly elected a member of the Forty-third Congress for the first district of Louisiana, and he is entitled to his seat.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move as a substitute for those two resolutions the resolution reported by the minority of the committee, to be found upon page 15 of the report, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. The question is all contained in these resolutions.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Not necessarily; I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That neither Effingham Lawrence nor J. Hale Sypher has shown himself entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I suppose there must have been a tie in that district.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I do not understand that there is any desire to discuss this question. I desire to call the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. SYPHER. I desire to be heard for a few moments on this question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I will give the gentleman five minutes after the previous question is seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SYPHER.]

Mr. SYPHER. Mr. Speaker, the House is in no temper to give attention to a contested-election case at this time. Only fifteen hours of this Congress remain, while many important public measures are yet to be considered. I would not crave your attention for a single moment were it not for the remarkable presentation of this case by your Committee on Elections. This committee has utterly failed, either for the want of time or the proper examination of the case, to present it in the light of the testimony. They have entirely ignored the proofs, and submitted reports full of errors and misstatements. The report of the committee supported by six members proves nothing, and the views of the minority signed by five members is absurd and ridiculous. A congressional district with twenty-five thousand legal voters, over twenty thousand of whom voted at an election for two candidates, and nobody elected. How can such a thing be possible? That is what the minority report, that neither party is entitled to a seat. A most remarkable conclusion. Somebody must have been elected unless it was a tie vote, and the minority do not so report. May I inquire of the gentlemen of the minority, if 20,000 votes elect nobody, how many votes are required to elect somebody? If they will give the solution to this problem, I have no doubt of the ability of my constituents to furnish the number of votes required to elect somebody in their opinion. I apprehend the gentlemen of the minority have presented a case reductio ad absurdum. Let this House pause before it establishes any such precedent.

Now, sir, I invite your attention to the majority report. It speaks of five returning boards claiming the right to canvass the returns. There could be only one legal returning board authorized by law to canvass election returns, and by twelve decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana it was determined which was the legal board. It was from that board that I held my credentials. But they say affidavits were counted as votes. Admitting it and allowing the number they claim, 1,314—but the testimony shows that less than 300 were counted—they cannot elect my opponent unless they ignore and reject the testimony that proves over 3,000 frauds in New Orleans.

Read the following testimony, and then let any man in the House answer how the contestant can be entitled to a seat here.

Mr. Long testifies, (pages 194–195:)

Question. Now, please state how many fraudulent votes were counted in the fourth ward.

Answer. According to memorandum made at the time, in the fourth ward there were 186.

Q. For what candidate for Congress in the first congressional district were those votes counted?
A. For Mr. Effingham Lawrence.
[Mr. Rice objected to this testimony, on the ground that the contestant had received no notice of such proof.]
Q. How many fraudulent votes were counted in the fifth ward, Mr. Long?
A. According to my memorandum, 155.
[Mr. Rice objected on the ground that the question assumed that there were fraudulent votes cast in these various wards before proof was adduced of that fact.]
Q. Were there any fraudulent votes cast in the fifth ward, Mr. Long?
A. There were, to my knowledge.
Q. How many?
A. A hundred and fifty-five.
Q. For whom were those fraudulent votes counted?
A. They were counted for the ticket headed by John McEnery and the straight ticket.
Q. For what candidate for Congress in the first congressional district?
A. For Mr. Lawrence.
Q. Were there any fraudulent votes counted in the sixth ward?
A. There were.
Q. How many?
A. At one poll 127 and at another poll 209.
Q. In all, how many?
A. In all, 336.
Q. Were there any fraudulent votes counted in the seventh ward?
A. There were.
Q. How many?
A. The number I don't remember. I made no note of it at the time.
Q. Were there any counted in the eighth ward?
A. There were.
Q. How many?
A. Three hundred and ninety-three.
Q. For what candidate for Congress were they counted?
A. The candidate that was on the ticket headed by John McEnery for governor.
Q. Did Mr. Sypher run on that ticket?
A. I don't think he did. I am sure he did not. I never saw him on the ticket.
Q. Were there any counted in the ninth ward?
A. There were.
Q. How many?
A. Two hundred and twenty-four.
Q. For whom were they counted for Congress?
A. For the person who ran on the same ticket as John McEnery.
Q. You testified with reference to certain polls being designated by the campaign committee of the fusion party, at which these fraudulent certificates should be voted upon. I want to ask you now in what political interest this combination was made and carried out?
A. In the interest of the ticket headed by Mr. McEnery, and on which Mr. Lawrence's name appeared in the first congressional district, as I understood it.
Q. Who designated to the registrar of voters for appointment the election commissioners in that portion of the parish of Orleans within the first congressional district.
A. The fusion campaign committee, of which Mr. Walker was chairman.
Q. Were there any republicans appointed as commissioners of election in those wards?
A. Some men that call themselves republicans now, but they did not call themselves so at the time.
Q. Were there any appointed who were then in sympathy with the republican party, as represented by the ticket headed by Mr. Kellogg?
A. Not one out of over three hundred, to my knowledge. I don't believe there was one in the city.

Mr. Downs testifies, (pages 235, 236, 237:)

Question. How many names of colored registered voters were improperly stricken from the rolls in the fourth ward?
Answer. I have the figures here that I made out myself some time ago.
Q. You can use them in refreshing your memory now in answering my question.
A. Three hundred and nine in the fourth ward were stricken from the rolls in that manner.
Q. Do you know whether any fraudulent duplicate certificates were issued?
[Mr. Rice objected to the question as leading.]
Q. Do you know whether any such thing was ever done or not for the first congressional district?
A. I do.
Q. Do you know whether any were issued in the wards within the first congressional district of this city?
[Objected to as leading.]
A. I do.
Q. State succinctly the manner in which such fraudulent or duplicate certificates were issued.
A. I can state how they were obtained. I decline to state how they were issued.
Q. State how they were obtained.
A. They were obtained by persons moving from one ward to another. According to the requirements of the registrars, each of these persons moving from one ward to another were to give up their original certificate and get a new one. These original certificates were sent to the central office of the State registrar of voters. Some of them were canceled, but many of them were reissued in this manner to be voted upon again.
Q. How many of such certificates were issued?
A. I should judge about three thousand of them.
Q. Can you approximate the number that was issued for the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth wards?
A. I should think there was about one thousand or twelve hundred used in those wards.
Q. To whom were those certificates given?
A. I decline to answer that question.
Q. Were they issued to republicans, or democrats, or fusionists?
A. They were issued to parties that I presume were in the fusion interest. I had no reason to doubt that they were.
Q. Were any issued to candidates on the fusion ticket, as far as you know?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you assist in the counting of the votes?
A. I did.
Q. Could you tell, from comparing the number of votes and the number of registered voters and the names upon the registration lists that were known to be represented by such fraudulent certificates, whether such fraudulent certificates were used or not?
A. I could.
Q. Did you make any such inspection?
A. I did.

Mr. Cannon testifies, (pages 243, 244, 245:)

Question. Do you know whether any frauds were committed in connection with the registration in the ninth ward?
Answer. There was.
Q. Of what nature?
A. Fraudulent papers, fraudulent voting, fraudulent papers that I know of.
Q. State the circumstances.
A. Well, I know of about eleven hundred fraudulent papers; there were about between three and four hundred fraudulent papers on the old books, that I had possession of, and I had possession of about one hundred on the new books, and I duplicated them, eight for each vote; for each vote I made eight certificates out.
Q. From the old registration?
A. No, sir, from the new registration.
Q. You say there were a hundred names?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And eight certificates for each, which made eight hundred?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. To whom were they given?
A. I decline to answer who they were given to.
Q. Do you know whether they were voted on election day?
A. I have reason to believe that they were.
Q. In the interest of what political party?
A. The fusion party; they were, most undoubtedly, not given to the republican party.
Q. Do you know whether they were voted for or against Mr. Sypher?
A. They were put there to vote against him; they were instructed to vote against the State republican ticket.
Q. Do you know whether there were any erasures improperly made?
A. I made the erasures myself.
[Mr. Rice objected on the ground that the question was leading.]
Q. Do you know whether there were any names erased from the registration lists?
[Mr. Rice objected on the same ground.]
A. Yes, sir; I made the erasures myself.
Q. Were they properly or improperly made?
A. Well, I just scratched only the colored people, and those that I knew to be republicans.
Q. Were you instructed to do so?
A. I had my instructions from Mr. Blanchard to scratch none but colored people, or if I knew any of the names in the interest of the republican ticket to scratch them off.
Q. How many did you scratch off?
A. Between a hundred and eighty-five and two hundred. I disremember the exact amount or number now.
Q. Were you present in the Mechanics' Institute during the counting of the votes of the ninth ward?
A. Yes, sir; from the beginning to the end of it.
Q. Do you know whether the count was fair or unfair?
A. There were some parties got a square count, and others did not.
Q. Do you know whether Mr. Sypher got a square count or not?
A. No, sir; he did not.
Q. What do you know about the count for Congressman?
A. Well, I know that I beat Mr. Sypher in the ward. I know that he got beat in the ward, and I helped to do it.
Q. Did you do that under instructions?
A. My instructions from Mr. Blanchard, in the Institute, were to hold the State ticket up.

On cross-examination:

Q. What were you at the time of the election; were you registrar?
A. I was first appointed clerk, and for a great part of the time I acted as registrar—both clerk and registrar.
Q. These acts that you have spoken of, you did as what?
A. In issuing papers, I did it when I was acting as registrar.
Q. Were you a sworn officer as registrar?
A. Not as registrar when these papers were issued; I was acting as registrar.
Q. Were you ever registrar at all?
A. I was registrar at the counting.
Q. Were you not sworn at all to the performance of your duties?
A. I was not sworn at all.

In Mr. Corey's testimony (pages 246, 247) will be found the following affidavit:

I was appointed chairman of the committee on naturalization in the ninth ward of the city of New Orleans by the democratic and fusion parties, and performed the duties assigned me during the last registration and election. * * * There were about 600 fraudulent votes polled in the seventh ward, about 600 in the eighth ward, and about 1,200 in the ninth ward, making in all about 2,400 fraudulent votes illegally polled on the day of election for the democratic fusion ticket.

Further citations of the testimony is unnecessary; there are over two hundred pages of conclusive and uncontradicted proofs. The foregoing are only specimens. The committee set up the very lame and preposterous plea that "the witnesses are subject to the criticism of being parties to the crime." On that point I quote the opinion of the minority, and I am glad to be able to agree with them in this particular. They say:

But if these witnesses were fit to intrust with the responsible duties assigned them by the fusion or democratic party, they ought to be fit to testify as to the manner in which they executed their trusts. It does not lie in the mouths of those who employed such agents, and who seek the advantage of their acts, to discredit their evidence.

But in the absence of any positive knowledge on the subject, the committee cannot disregard the testimony of witnesses whose statements are not on their face untrue, and who stand unimpeached. If these witnesses have such reputations for truth and veracity where they reside, why have they not been impeached? Why leave the duty of impeaching them to the attorney who argued the case? It was due the committee, as it was due the House, that these witnesses should have been duly impeached if they could be.

The testimony of these witnesses and others is fully supported by documents and contemporaneous records.

They are the men who, together with the democratic executive committee of New Orleans, planned and executed the gigantic scheme of fraud in Louisiana, in the election of 1872, which came so near suppressing the will of the people and subverting the government in that State.

By no rules of evidence or practice established by this House in contested-election cases can this testimony be rightfully rejected. It must be considered, and, if considered, you must find that I am elected by over 1,000 majority by the returns of the legal or illegal returning board.

Here is the result in tabulated form, from which there is no escape.

Returns of Lynch board, (page 146 of the testimony.)

Sypher's majority		1,130

This is the result of the election in that district, as shown by the testimony. If you accept the testimony you must confirm me in my seat; if you reject it the House can elect the contestant; but the voters of the first district of Louisiana did not do so, and there is absolutely no proof going to show that they did. Before closing I desire to say in justice to my opponent that whatever may have been done in that election to defraud electors of their franchise and to reverse the will of the majority, he had no part nor lot in it. I desire to exonorate him most fully of all connection with such transactions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 4680) to further protect the sinking fund and provide for the exigencies of the Government; when the Speaker signed the same.

ELECTION CONTEST—LAWRENCE VS. SYPHER.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield me five minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. It is not my purpose to detain the House at this late hour of the session with any discussion on this question. If every gentleman upon this floor had time or would take time to read the testimony which is referred to and quoted from in the report of the minority of the Committee on Elections I should have no doubt whatever, not a particle of doubt, as to the result of this question. The minority, constituting five members of the committee, upon a careful examination of the testimony in this case came to the conclusion that we could not afford to affirm the right of either of these parties to a seat in this House, and that opinion was predicated upon what we believed to have been a most stupendous system of frauds in conducting the election in this first district of Louisiana and in counting and canvassing the votes—frauds so shameless, so flagrant, so stupendous on the part of the parties charged with the management of this election, that no gentleman can afford to indorse it or can afford to affirm the right of either of the contestants to a seat upon the floor of this House which grows out of such an election. It is asserted in the minority report that instead of being an election there was a premeditated design, a conspiracy, on the part of political managers to prevent an election and to prostitute the ballot. The testimony bears out this conclusion in my judgment, and I cannot therefore do less than resist the action proposed by the majority of the committee. There was in no just sense an election, which I understand to be a decision of the voters of a given district in the manner prescribed by law, a choice of the electors of a given district between two contesting candidates.

As I said before, I have not time now to go into the testimony; but I protest against either party being allowed to take a seat in this House. The precedents of the House authorize the course pursued by the minority in this case. The doctrine has been more than once affirmed that when frauds and irregularities have been so gross and general as to pervade the entire election and the returns thereof that it is competent to deny the right of either party to a seat in the House.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON,] I have to say that this contested case has been very carefully and thoroughly examined by the Committee on Elections. The report, which has been printed and which I hope gentlemen have read, shows that both the Forman and Lynch boards came to the conclusion that Mr. Lawrence was elected. After the Lynch board had come to that conclusion thirteen hundred and fourteen affidavits were brought in and counted for Mr. SYPHER, and by that means the Lynch board was induced to give him the return, and upon that the certificate of the governor was issued to him.

Without reviewing the case now, considering the spirit which prevails in this House, I wish to state that fact as an offset to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HAZELTON.] I now call for a vote.

The question was upon adopting as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee the following resolution reported by the minority:

Resolved, That neither Effingham Lawrence nor J. Hale Sypher has shown himself entitled to a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 45, noes 94.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 117; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; there being 30 in the affirmative, (more than one-fifth of a quorum;) and Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, and Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, were appointed as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 45, noes not counted.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 144, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Fort, Freeman, Hagans, Harmer, Havens, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, George F. Thomas, Thornburgh, Jasper D. Ward, Charles G. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—58.

So the resolution of the minority was not adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the first resolution reported by the majority of the committee, that J. HALE SYPHER was not elected a member of this Congress.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move to lay both resolutions on the table.

Mr. DAWES. That would leave Mr. SYPHER in his seat.

The SPEAKER. That would confirm the sitting member.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I desire to have the sense of the House taken upon laying these resolutions on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. If the motion is agreed to, the effect of it will be to keep in his seat a gentleman who not one member of the committee says was elected.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw that motion, and make it upon the second resolution.

The first resolution reported from the committee was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That J. Hale Sypher was not elected a member of the Forty-third Congress from the first district, of Louisiana.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was upon the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Effingham Lawrence was duly elected a member of the Forty-third Congress for the first district of Louisiana, and he is entitled to his seat.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. Why would not the same result be reached by taking a direct vote on the resolution?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I prefer to have the vote taken upon the motion to lay it on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 63, noes 109.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the second resolution.

Mr. TODD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 86, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Cannon, Caulfield, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, William Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barber, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Chittenden, Clinton L. Cobb, Curtis, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Duell, Eames, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hendee, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Howe, Kellogg, Kendall, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Marshall, Maynard, James W. McDill, McKee, McLean, Moore, Myers, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Pike, Rainey, James C. Robinson, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sloss, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Strait, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, and Ephraim K. Wilson—66.

So the second resolution was agreed to.

Mr. EFFINGHAN LAWRENCE presented himself and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

CLAIM AGENTS IN CONGRESS AND DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 4849) to regulate the appearance and compensation of agents and attorneys prosecuting claims or demands before Congress and the Executive Departments of the Government, and for other purposes. This bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means in connection with the report upon the Pacific Mail investigation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act no person shall be permitted to appear or act as agent or attorney for any individual, body-politic or corporate, relative to any claim or demand against the United States, or any legislation involving appropriations of the money, property, or credit of the United States, either before Congress or any committee thereof, when either he or any other person has any interest, directly or indirectly, in said claim, demand, or legislation, or any agreement for compensation for services in obtaining payment of such claim, demand, or passage of such legislation, until such agent or attorney shall file with the Clerk of the House and of the Senate his name and residence and the title of the claim, demand, or subject in relation to which he desires to so appear, and a statement on oath, in writing, of the amount and character of compensation which the party or parties in interest have agreed to pay for services rendered relative thereto. And a duplicate of such statement shall be filed by such agent or attorney with the committee or committees of either House before which he may so appear. And no person so interested shall be permitted to appear or act as agent or attorney in any matter pending before any Department of the Government until he shall file with the chief clerk of that Department his name and residence and the title of the matter in relation to which he desires so to appear, and a statement on oath, in writing, of the amount and character of compensation which the claimant has agreed to pay for services rendered relative thereto. No greater sum than the amount thus stated shall be collectible out of or because of services rendered concerning said claim, demand, or legislation. All other and further agreements for the payment of additional compensation relative to such services shall be null and void. If any money or other thing of value is paid, directly or indirectly, by the party or parties in interest, or any one for him or them, to any person or persons, beyond the amount so filed, or otherwise than as stated in said paper required to be filed as aforesaid, it may be recovered by any person suing for the same from the person so receiving it, or from any person interested in the payment so made, by suit in any court of the United States, one-third of which recovery shall be paid to the person suing therefor, and the other two-thirds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. And all persons directly or indirectly receiving any compensation in excess of or otherwise than as set forth in said statement, required to be filed as aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, and may, in addition thereto, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Any person who shall willfully violate the provisions of this act by appearing as agent or attorney before Congress, or any committee of either House, or before any Department of the Government, without previously filing his name, residence, title of matter, and statement of the compensation agreed to be paid to him, as required by this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, and may, in addition thereto, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court. And any individual, or any officer of any body-politic or corporate who shall, in violation of the provisions of this act, pay, or agree to pay, to any agent or attorney any money, or other thing of value, in excess of the compensation stated in such affidavit on file, or shall, with intent that the statement required by this act shall not be filed, employ an agent or attorney who shall neglect to file such statement, such individual or officer shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, and may, in addition thereto, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That any individual or officer of any body politic or corporate who shall give, or agree to give, any money or other thing of value as compensation or reward to any officer or employé of either House of Congress, or of any committee thereof, for services for or in connection with any such claim or demand, or legislation pending before Congress, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, and may, in addition thereto, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court. And any officer or employé of either House of Congress, or of any committee thereof, or any reporter or correspondent permitted to have a place in the gallery of either House, who shall receive any gift of money or other thing of value as compensation or reward for services for or in connection with any claim or demand or legislation pending before Congress, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any court of the United States, shall be fined not exceeding $500, and may, in addition thereto, be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court; and in addition, any sum so given or paid may be recovered by any person suing for the same, from the person so receiving it, by suit in any court of the United States, one-third of which recovery shall be paid to the person suing therefor, and the other two-thirds shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, there being—ayes 113, noes 31.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I move that the rules be suspended and that Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3341) for the equalization of bounties be taken from the Speaker's table and non-concurred in, and a conference with the Senate asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Is it in order to move concurrence in those amendments?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be amended.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GUNCKEL.]

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. GUNCKEL was then agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. GUNCKEL, Mr. COBURN, and Mr. ELDREDGE as the committee of conference on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 4747) supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1995) to amend the act approved June 18, 1838, entitled "An act to require the judge of the district courts of East and West Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson in said State."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1282) to change the place of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States for the district of Nevada.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I present the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 12.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 10; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 9 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out insert the following: "Provided, That no money shall hereafter be paid to any railroad company for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States over any railroad which in whole or in part was constructed by the aid of a grant of public land on the condition that such railroads should be a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States free from toll or other charge, or upon any other conditions for the use of such road for such transportation, nor shall any allowance be made for the transportation of officers of the Army over any such road when on duty and under orders as military officers of the United States. But nothing herein contained shall be construed as preventing any such railroad from bringing a suit in the Court of Claims for the charges for such transportation and recovering for the same, if found entitled thereto by virtue of the laws in force prior to the passage of this act: Provided, That the claim for such charges shall not have been barred by the statute of limitations at the time of bringing the suit, and either party shall have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided, further, That the foregoing provision shall not apply for the current fiscal year, nor thereafter, to roads where the sole condition of transportation is that the company shall not charge the Government higher rates than they do individuals for like transportation, and when the Quartermaster-General shall be satisfied that this condition has been faithfully complied with."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the word proposed to be inserted insert the word "one;" and after the word "one hundred," in line 13, page 9 of the bill, insert the words "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 14 and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Insert after the words "ordnance stores," in line 11 of said amendment, the words "in the service of the United States in the suppression of the war of the rebellion," and add at the end of said amendment the following:

"And provided further, That so much of the appropriations between the 1st of January, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, under the act of April 23, 1808, herein referred to, as would have been used for the purchase of arms to be distributed to the several States that were in rebellion shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM A. WHEELER,
JOHN COBURN,
A. M. WADDELL,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JOHN W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF EMBASSADORS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has the floor, but yields to his colleague to take up some matters by unanimous consent on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table two Senate bills. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who had charge of them, is ill and unable to be present this evening, and has asked me to call them up.

I ask first to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 1328) to amend sections 1675, 1676, 1681, and 1682 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and pass it at this time.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 1675 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 1675. Embassadors and envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary shall be entitled to compensation at the rates following, per annum, namely:

Those to France, Germany, Great Britain, and Russia, each, $17,500.

Those to Austria, Brazil, China, Italy, Japan, Mexico, and Spain, each, $12,000.

Those to all other countries, unless where a different compensation is prescribed by law, each, $10,000.

And, unless when otherwise provided by law, ministers resident and commissioners shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of 75 per cent., charges d'affaires at rate of 50 per cent., and secretaries of legation at the rate of 15 per cent. of the amounts allowed to embassadors, envoys extraordinary, and ministers plenipotentiary to the said countries respectively; except that the secretary of legation to Japan shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

The second secretaries of the legations to France, Germany, and Great Britain shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $2,000 each per annum.

That section 1676 of the said Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

The agent and consul-general at Cairo shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $3,500 per annum.

That section 1681 be amended so as to read as follows:

The minister resident to Uruguay, when also accredited to Paraguay, shall be entitled to compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

That the following be added to section 1682:

And he shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation of this.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have not before me the Senate report. But I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, Judge ORTH, who is absent, that this bill was prepared at the State Department, was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, and passed there by unanimous consent; and that its object is to correct a construction that it was thought might be put on the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in the bill, which would have the effect of changing existing laws; that it creates no additional salaries and raises no salaries.

One of the objects I can explain exactly. The law states that when consuls are employed as chargé d'affaires in the absence of a minister, they shall have the salary of secretary of legation. Twenty-five of our foreign ministers have no secretary of legation. It was left without a standard. This is to establish a proportion exactly the same as in cases where we have a secretary of legation, so that the matter may be made definite. I understand from the Secretary of State, and from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the effect of the language in the Revised Statutes is to alter the law and the practice as it then stood; and the object of the bill is simply to make the meaning of the Revised Statutes clear, and to apply existing law to cases which they may have left unprovided for.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

CONSULATES AT AMOOR RIVER AND VLADIVOSTOCK.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I also ask that by unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 1339) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, and for other purposes, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The bill was read. It provides that Amoor River, in Russia, be discontinued as a consulate of class 5, in Schedule B, as the same was amended by chapter 275 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress; and that Vladivostock be a consulate of class 5, in Schedule B. The bill further exempts the consul at Vladivostock and the consuls at Fayal and Auckland from the prohibition to engage in business and trade embraced in sections 1699 and 1700 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

SAMUEL S. POTTER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 786) for the relief of Samuel S. Potter, and that the same be passed. This bill appropriates $750 to Rev. Mr. Potter, a Presbyterian minister. It passed in last Congress both Houses, but reached the President too late to receive his signature.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Samuel S. Potter, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $750, the same being in full of all claims against the Government for expenses incurred by the said Potter by reason of the seizure of his seminary buildings by J. F. Head, medical director of the district of Kentucky, for hospital purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. COX. I ask the House, by unanimous consent, to pass the joint resolution (H. R. No. 129) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to promote the efficiency of the teachers of the public schools of said District.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object.

Mr. COX. This does not levy any tax.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It ought to pass.

Mr. COX. I move that the rules be suspended and that the joint resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] does not yield for anything but by unanimous consent.

JOHN SPICER.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on War Claims and have put upon its passage a bill for the relief of John Spicer, of Ottawa, Illinois.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPEER. What is the amount involved in this bill?

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. SPEER. Is it unanimously reported?

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a bill to amend the Revised Statutes relating to internal revenue.

The bill was read.

Mr. BECK. This bill was drawn by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Objection was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That the rules be so suspended that the House shall proceed to business on the Speaker's table; the civil-rights bill of the Senate to be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider; all the remaining bills on the Speaker's table be considered under a five-minute debate pro and con, subject to all points of order; and upon a point of order being sustained, a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill may be made.

Mr. RANDALL. I consider, for one, that that is an unsafe way of proceeding to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; it is perfectly safe.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a most dangerous way of going to the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What is the particular danger which the gentleman apprehends?

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to suggest the manner in which, in my judgment, we should go to the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. What is the particular danger of this?

Mr. RANDALL. Why, we may reach bills that no point of order lies against and that a majority can pass.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that in regard to this proposed resolution it does not allow anything less than a two-thirds vote to pass any bill that pays one dollar of money out of the Treasury or appropriates any of the property of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; but there are bills there of the most dangerous character that do not appropriate money at all, and I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the reading of the resolution again.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall object to its being read a second time unless I can have an opportunity to suggest a remedy to the evil which this resolution would entail.

The SPEAKER. Then the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to know whether under this order such bills as those for the admission of Colorado and New Mexico could not be passed by a majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. Under this rule any bill upon the Speaker's table could be passed by a majority that does not appropriate either the money or property of the Government.

Mr. CESSNA. And does not the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] desire to have those bills in reference to Colorado and New Mexico passed?

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 145, nays 95, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lansing, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Myers, Negley, Niles, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloss, Small, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Woodworth—145.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crossland, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lawson, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Monroe, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheridan, A. Herr Smith, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—95.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Chittenden, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Davis, DeWitt, Frye, Garfield, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, Houghton, Hurlbut, Kendall, Lamport, Effingham Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leach, Maynard, Moore, Morey, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Phillips, Pike, Rainey, James C. Robinson, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, George L. Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Smith, Sprague, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Waddell, Wallace, Wheeler, Whitehouse, and Wolfe—48.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcement was made:

Mr. LOWNDES. I am requested to state that Mr. ORTH, of Indiana, is absent on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be so suspended that the House now proceed to the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table in order, referring the civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee, and leaving all points of order in force, and that no bill shall be passed except by unanimous consent or a vote of two-thirds, and that, if asked for, five minutes' debate be allowed on each side on any bill.

Mr. CONGER. There would be no possibility of passing any bill under such a rule as that.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest the further modification: "Provided that the civil-rights bill shall not be passed."

The SPEAKER. It could not be passed.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will modify it so as to provide that the civil-rights bill shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It could not possibly come back except by a suspension of the rules.

The question was taken on the resolution offered by Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the resolution was adopted.

ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following concurrent resolution received from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 3, 1875.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, when they examine the bill of the Senate No. 378, to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands, be authorized to change the title to said bill to read as follows: "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States;" the amendment of the title to the said bill having been accidentally omitted in the recommendation of the committee of conference on said bill.

JOSEPH H. MADDOX.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 3789, for the relief of Joseph H. Maddox, and that the same be now passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill directs the proper officers of the Treasury Department to adjust, settle, and pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the claim of Joseph H. Maddox, in his own right and as assignee of Benjamin F. Camp and D. Preston Parr, for their loss and damage sustained under the contract made with them on the 13th day of November, 1864, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, by H. A. Risley, supervising special agent of the Treasury Department, for the delivery of six thousand boxes of tobacco and other products of States declared in insurrection, and in the adjustment of said claim the instrument of writing given on the said 13th of November, 1864, by said special agent of the Treasury to said Camp, Maddox, and Parr, requesting safe conduct and means of transportation for said products, and provides that the order made thereon by the President of the United States on the 17th day of November, 1864, shall be considered as part of said contract; and the allowance shall be for the proper value of such tobacco at the time the respective lots were detained, seized, destroyed, or used by the civil or military authorities of the United States, either while in course of transportation or while in store in the city of Richmond at the time of the capture of said city; provided that no allowance shall be made for such of said tobacco as was destroyed in the said city by fire; and provided that no payment shall be made for any tobacco destroyed by order as a military necessity.

Objections were made.

PAY OF PAGES.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent to submit for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the pages of the House their salaries for the entire month of March out of the contingent fund of the House.

That is usual; the pages are kept here until near the close of the month waiting on the members who remain.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS OF ARMY AND NAVY OFFICERS.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill to still further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill provides that the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy, approved June 23, 1870, and further continued by the act of June 18, 1874, shall be still further continued for one year from June 23, 1875, and no longer.

Mr. COBURN. I have here a letter from the Secretary of War which will explain the necessity for the passage of this bill.

The letter was as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 2, 1875.

SIR: Referring to the act of June 18, 1874, "to further continue the act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of officers of the Army and Navy," (chapter 302, Forty-third Congress, first session,) I have the honor to inform you that the Third Auditor of the Treasury reports that "all the cases properly coming under the provisions of the act have not been adjusted for want of time.

"The interest of the Government clearly demands the extension of the act for at least one year longer; if it is not extended Congress will be subjected to the importunities of officers whose cases have not yet been considered, and special acts passed for each case when relief is needed."

In view of this report the Quartermaster-General recommends that the act referred to be extended for one year from 23d June next, and I have the honor to inclose draught of a bill to extend the act for one year, with the earnest recommendation that the same be submitted to the House with the favorable report of your committee.

I have written a similar letter to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN COBURN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 4865) was received, read three times, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There are some unanimous consents to be asked for which will not take much time to dispose of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will wait for a few minutes.

PRINTING OF ADDRESSES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution of the Senate:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That ten thousand copies of the addresses delivered in the two Houses on the occasion of the death of Hon. William A. Buckingham, late a Senator from the State of Connecticut, be printed and bound, five thousand each for the use of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

LAND CLAIMS UNDER ASHBURTON TREATY.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That James A. Drew and others having preferred a claim for compensation for lands which were taken from them and those preceding them in title and interest by the Ashburton treaty of 1842, as described in House report No. 386 of this session, the Secretary of State be directed to investigate and inform the House whether the said lands were taken from said James A. Drew and others in changing and fixing the boundary line between the United States and the province of New Brunswick by the adoption of the Ashburton treaty; if so, the number of acres so taken, the value thereof, and if said parties are not entitled to compensation for the lands so taken under the treaty aforesaid.

MAJOR N. H. M'LEAN.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs, for consideration at this time, a bill for the relief of Major N. H. McLean, late of the Adjutant-General's Department of the United States Army.

The bill authorizes the President to appoint Major Nathaniel H. McLean, late of the United States Army, to fill the first vacancy which may occur in the lowest grade of the Adjutant-General's Department; or, if he shall deem it best, to reinstate and retire him on the rank to which he would have attained in the service at the date of the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4866) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. GUNCKEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARTHA J. COSTON.

Mr. LAMISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4867) for the relief of Martha J. Coston; which was read three times, and passed.

The bill appropriates the sum of $15,000 to pay Martha J. Coston in full of all her claim and demands upon the Government of the United States for the use of the Coston signal-light and the manufacture by her of the same.

Mr. LAMISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CESSNA. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] insist upon the regular order against his colleague, [Mr. KELLEY?]

Mr. CESSNA. I insist upon it against any and all persons.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, bills will now be taken from the Speaker's table and disposed of in pursuance of the order of the House.

FOURTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

The first bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 1196) to alter and appoint the times for holding the circuit court of the United States for the fourth judicial circuit, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill stands in a somewhat peculiar position. It was passed by the House, and was then returned from the Senate by request.

Mr. SENER. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. Why is that necessary?

Mr. SENER. It is a very objectionable bill.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was so referred.

PROCEEDINGS IN MANDAMUS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out all after "may" to the end of the line, and insert "if necessary for purposes of justice be revived against his."

At the end of the bill add the following:

SEC. 2. That the circuit courts of the United States shall be, and are hereby, given power to issue the writ of mandamus in all causes at law or in equity of which they have jurisdiction, and in which such a writ by the common or chancery law is an appropriate remedy, or by way of original proceedings when such writ is necessary to any jurisdiction possessed by said court and is a proper remedy.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think there is no objection to that bill. It was reported from the Judiciary Committee.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

DEBTS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 2, after "United States" insert "or other claim duly allowed by legal authority."

Page 1, line 3, after "plaintiff" insert "or claimant."

Page 1, line 7, after "plaintiff" insert "or claimant."

Page 1, line 8, after "judgment" insert "or an amount thereof equal to said debt or claim."

Page 1, line 15, strike out "such claim" and insert "the debt of the United States."

The amendments were concurred in.

PUNISHMENT OF MANSLAUGHTER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 4, strike out "20" and insert "10."

At the end of the bill add the following:

Provided, That said act shall remain in force for the punishment of all persons who have heretofore committed the crime of manslaughter.

The amendments were concurred in.

SECOND NATIONAL BANK, JAMESTOWN, NEW YORK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4324) to authorize the change of the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 5, after "board" insert "confirmed by a vote of two-thirds of the stockholders."

The amendment was concurred in.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. COX. I thought that bill was disposed of. I call for the reading of the amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 2, lines 15 and 16, strike out "from the passage of this act," and insert "next after the 1st day of September, 1875."

Page 3, strike out all after "lands" where it first occurs in line 18 down to and including "United States," in line 20.

Page 4, line 6, after "time" insert "in the month of July, 1876."

Page 5, line 13, after "thereof" insert "and with the approval of the President."

Page 5, line 23, after "located" insert "and with the approval."

Page 5, line 26, after "selected" insert "and approved."
Page 6, line 4, strike out "or" and insert "and."
Page 6, line 14, after "of" insert "agricultural."
Page 6, line 14, strike out "have been or."
Page 6, line 15, strike out "prior or."
Page 6, at the end of line 19 insert:
Provided, That this section shall not apply to any lands disposed of under the homestead laws of the United States, or to any lands now or hereafter reserved for public or other uses.
Page 6, strike out section 13.
At the end of the bill add the following:
SEC. —. That all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation and grants of this act.

Mr. BECK and Mr. W. R. ROBERTS called for the yeas and nays in concurring on the amendments of the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 164, nays 76, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Berry, Biery, Bradley, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Caulfield, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Buffinton, Bundy, Burrows, Caldwell, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Creamer, Crutchfield, Davis, DeWitt, Eden, Frye, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamison, Lamport, Loughridge, Maynard, Mitchell, Moore, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, Orth, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James C. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Wilber, Wolfe, and John D. Young—48.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the amendments of the Senate concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. ORTH, who was absent on account of ill health; and that while he would vote in the negative, his colleague would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. McNULTA stated that his colleague, Mr. HAWLEY, was detained from the House on account of sickness.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD stated that he was paired with Mr. WOLFE, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ALBRIGHT stated that he was requested to state that Mr. KELLEY was paired with Mr. WOOD.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE said: I was not here during the roll-call, but I believe I have the right to vote, as I was absent on committee service.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Does not the gentleman from Iowa have a right to vote, his committee having the right to sit during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Did the House give the committee such permission?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman cannot vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments an act (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and to refer them to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was a bill (H. R. No. 2418) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. COX. I object to taking that up.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered:

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas, 154, nays 87, not voting 47, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Caulfield, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Creamer, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hodges, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Hynes, Kasson, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamison, Lansing, William Lawrence, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Negley, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—154.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Durham, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Lamar, Lawson, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, Schell, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheridan, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Speer, Sprague, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waldron, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—87.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ashe, Banning, Berry, Buffinton, Burrows, Caldwell, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Crutchfield, Darrall, Davis, DeWitt, Eden, Frye, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, John B. Hawley, George F. Hoar, Houghton, Kelley, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Effingham Lawrence, Leach, Moore, Morrison, Nesmith, Nile, Nunn, Orth, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, James C. Robinson, Ross, John G. Schumaker, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Strawbridge, Charles R. Thomas, Thornburgh, Wheeler, Wolfe, Woodworth, and John D. Young—47.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD said: I am paired with Mr. WOLFE, of Indiana. If he were here he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. CESSNA. I ask the Chair to rule on the meaning of the resolution under which we are now proceeding. I take it that it requires but a majority to concur in amendments of the Senate. I wish to say in justice to myself that I had no hand in drawing the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.] It only provides for a two-thirds vote on the passage of a bill I submit that a majority can concur in amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be so suspended that the House now proceed to the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table in order, referring the Senate civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, leaving all points of order in force, and that no bill be passed except by unanimous consent on a vote of two-thirds, and that if asked for, five minutes' debate be allowed on each side on any bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that the resolution only requires two-thirds in order to pass a bill and that this is concurring in Senate amendment——

Mr. RANDALL. Which does pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. Which is not provided for in the resolution. But the Chair thinks that as concurring in the Senate amendments passes a bill it requires a two-thirds vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the district courts of the United States.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

The bill (H. R. No. 3820) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3821) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes of Indians for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to restore to the Speaker's table a couple of bills now in the Judiciary Committee, that they may be considered under the rules under which the House is now proceeding.

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. POLAND. I rise to present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 3511) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the district courts of the United States, respectfully report that they have met; and after a full and free conference they have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreements to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments:

First. In section 3 strike out the words "before the final hearing or trial therein" where they first occur therein and insert instead thereof as follows: "before or at the term at which said causes could be first tried and before the trial thereof."

Second. Strike out sections 7, 8, and 11 of said Senate amendment.

Third. In section 9 of said Senate amendment strike out the words "civil or criminal" in the first line of said section.

Fourth. In line 11 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, after the word "any," insert the word "such," and strike out the words "civil or criminal" where they occur in said line.

Fifth. In line 17 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the word "prosecution."

Sixth. In line 21 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the words "civil or criminal."

Seventh. In lines 28 and 29 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the words "civil or criminal."

Eighth. In line 34 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the words "criminal prosecution or penal" and insert in place thereof the word "such."

Ninth. In line 36 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the words "indictment, presentment, or other."

Tenth. In line 39 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the word "prosecution."

Eleventh. In line 41 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the word "prosecution."

Twelfth. In lines 42 and 43 of said section 9 of said Senate amendment, strike out the words "if the cause be of a civil nature, at law or in equity."

Thirteenth. In line 1 of said section 10 of said Senate amendment, strike out the word "civil."

Fourteenth. In line 9 of said section 10 of said Senate amendment, after the words "or claim to," insert these words: "or to remove any incumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title and to."

Fifteenth. Strike out section 13 of said Senate amendment and insert instead thereof the following: "All acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Sixteenth. Amend the title of said House bill to read as follows: "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes."

LUKE P. POLAND,
LYMAN TREMAIN,
CHARLES A. ELDREDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.
MATT. H. CARPENTER,
ALLEN G. THURMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. POLAND. I will take no time to explain this, unless some gentleman desires to ask any questions about the report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMISSION OF TAXES.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 4833) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and remit certain taxes and penalties claimed to be due from mining and other corporations in the sixth collection district of Michigan, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read as follows:

In line 3 strike out "issued by" and insert "made against."

Strike out all after "corporations" in line 4, down to and including "Michigan" in line 5, and insert "other than against any national banking association, State bank or banking association,"

In line 10, strike out "either."

In line 11, strike out "or otherwise in such district" and insert "except as the national banking associations."

In line 12, after the word "issued" insert "re-issued."

Amend the title so that it shall read: "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and remit certain taxes and penalties claimed to be due from mining and other corporations, and for other purposes."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I think there will be no objection to these amendments. This is a bill which was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection; and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

REFUNDING OF CUSTOMS DUTIES.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties, and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

That no moneys collected as duties on imports, in accordance with any decision, ruling, or direction previously made or given by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, except as hereinafter provided, be refunded or repaid, unless in accordance with the judgment of a circuit or district court of the United States giving construction to the law, and from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States; or unless in pursuance of a special appropriation for the particular refund or repayment to be made; Provided, That whenever the Secretary shall be of opinion that such duties have been assessed and collected under an erroneous view of the facts in the case, he may authorize a re-examination and reliquidation in such case, and make such refund in accordance with existing laws as the facts so ascertained shall, in his opinion, justify; but no such reliquidation shall be allowed unless protest and appeal shall have been made as required by law: Provided further, That the restrictive provisions of this act shall not apply to such personal and household effects and other articles, not merchandise, as are by law exempt from duty: And provided also, That this act shall not affect the refund of excess of deposits based on estimated duties nor prevent the correction of errors in liquidation, whether for or against the Government, arising solely upon errors of fact discovered within one year from the date of payment and, when in favor of the Government, brought to the notice of the collector within ten days from the date of discovery.

SEC. 2. That no ruling or decision once made by the Secretary of the Treasury, giving construction to any law imposing customs duties, shall be reversed or modified adversely to the United States by the same or a succeeding Secretary, except in concurrence with an opinion of the Attorney-General recommending the same, or a judicial decision of a circuit or district court of the United States conflicting with such ruling or decision, and from which the Attorney-General shall certify that no appeal or writ of error will be taken by the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, decline to acquiesce in the judgment, decision, or ruling of an inferior court upon any question affecting the interests of the United States, when, in his opinion, such interests require a final adjudication of such question by the court of last resort.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make such regulations, not inconsistent with law, as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall, in his annual report to Congress, give a detailed statement of the various sums of money refunded under the provisions of this act or of any other act of Congress relating to the revenue, together with copies of the rulings under which repayments were made.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that that bill may be informally laid aside, without losing its right until the members of the Committee on Ways and Means have an opportunity to examine it a little carefully.

Subsequently Mr. KASSON said: I ask now for action on the bill (H. R. No. 2073.) The amendment of the Senate leaves the bill substantially as the House passed it, without material alterations.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

GEORGE A. SCHREINER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3685) for the relief of George A. Schreiner, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "as a volunteer" and insert "having been employed as a steamboat pilot."

At the end of the bill add:

"The said rate to commence from and after the passage of this act."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

PUNISHMENTS OF LARCENIES, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 4744) to punish certain larcenies and receivers of stolen goods, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is a long bill, and the amendments of the Senate are merely verbal. I ask that they be concurred in without reading.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

SECURITY OF NAVIGATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3379) for the further security of navigation on the Mississippi River, returned from the Senate with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who is a member of the Special Committee on Louisiana Affairs, had a right to present his views upon that question in writing, and he now presents them.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Amend section 4 by inserting after the word "all" the words "or any."

Strike out all after "lumber" in line 6 to the end of the bill and insert "with a specific report in each case."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

DEDUCTIONS FROM TERMS OF SENTENCE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3504) to provide for deductions from terms of sentence of United States criminals, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following:

SEC. 2. That on the discharge from any prison of any person convicted in the courts of the United States on indictment he or she shall be provided by the warden or keeper of said prison with one plain suit of clothes and five dollars in money, for which charge shall be made and allowed in the accounts of said person with the United States: Provided, That this section shall not apply to persons sentenced to a term of imprisonment of less than six months.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

COURTS AT JACKSON, TENNESSEE.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 1995) to amend the act approved June 16, 1838, entitled "An act to require the judge of the eastern district of Tennessee to hold a court at Jackson, in said State," returned from the Senate, with amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in without being read.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

The SPEAKER. Under the order this bill will be referred to the Judiciary Committee, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ALEXANDER MINOR.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 671) for the relief of Alexander Minor, of West Virginia.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alexander Minor, of Company B, Twelfth Regiment West Virginia Infantry Volunteers, the sum of $250, being the amount of pay and bounty due him.

There being no objection, the bill received its several readings, and was passed.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery.

Mr. SENER. I object to that bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate requested the return to that body of House bill No. 1273 to regulate proceedings in mandamus, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made the request of the Senate will be acceded to.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

CONTRACTORS OF WAR VESSELS AND STEAM-MACHINERY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claims for building vessels of war and constructing steam-machinery, referred to and embraced in the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, which is hereby vested with authority and jurisdiction to hear and determine the respective claims of the several parties: Provided, however, That the investigation of said claims shall be upon the following basis: The said court shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by said contractors for the building of said vessels of war and in the construction of steam-machinery, in the completion of the same by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required, and delays in the prosecution of the work, which were not provided for in the original contract; but no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered unless such advance occurred during the prolonged term for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractors: And provided further, That the compensation fixed by the contracts between the contractors and the Government for specific alterations shall be conclusive as to the compensation to be made therefor: And provided further, That all moneys paid to said contractors by the Government, over and above the original contract price for the building of said vessels and the construction of said machinery shall be deducted from any amounts allowed by said court by reason of the matters hereinbefore stated; and if the amounts so to be deducted in any case shall exceed the amount allowed by said court, judgment shall be entered for the excess against such claimant in favor of the United States; and said court is directed to certify such judgment and record to the circuit court of the circuit where such claimant resides, and said circuit court is hereby vested with authority to issue execution and to enforce its collection the same as if said judgment had originally been rendered therein: And provided further, That if any of such changes caused less work and expense to the contractors than the original plans and specifications, a corresponding reduction shall be made from the contract price, and the amount thereof be deducted from any allowance to be made by said court to said claimants: And provided further, That all claims under the provisions of this act shall be presented within one year from the passage thereof and not afterward; and the claimants in their petitions shall stipulate and agree to accept and abide by all the provisions of this act.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to suspend the rules and pass this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the standing order now regulating the proceedings of the House are not five minutes allowed for debate on each side of the pending proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] is entitled to five minutes, and whoever follows him will be entitled to five minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Any one who observed the reading of this bill must have noticed that it is surrounded by all the guards possible to protect the Government from any danger of a judgment against it for money not absolutely due to one of its citizens. It is important to pass this bill in order to settle a controversy which has existed here in Congress ever since the close of the war, in regard to the construction of certain light-draught iron-clad vessels, where the Navy Department ordered change after change, not knowing what they themselves needed, and did not pay in full for those changes. This question has been here in every Congress, and every committee that has reported upon it has reported either in favor of paying these contractors or of sending them to the Court of Claims. A bill passed both Houses during the Fortieth Congress, and the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] then a member of this House, voted for the bill. That bill, however, did not contain as many guards as this does; it wanted one important one, and the President vetoed it on that ground.

This bill settles this question once for all. If the Government owes these parties anything, then under this bill they can go to the Court of Claims and prove their case. It is provided at the same time that if they have been overpaid the Government can recover back the sum overpaid them. In addition to that the Government of the United States has the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, I ask members of this House if they are afraid to trust their own citizens in the Court of Claims with the right of appeal on the part of the Government to the Supreme Court of the United States?

In the Senate of the United States the late Senator Sumner and a score of other Senators of equal standing have advocated these claims over and over again, either to pay them or allow the claimants to go to the Court of Claims to prove their just rights. We have sent two or three there, and have paid two or three of them. We paid one of them at the last session of Congress, Mr. Bestor, who died waiting here at the doors of Congress before his claim was allowed. We sent Miles Greenwood to the Court of Claims, with one of the weakest cases.

All that we assert is that these seven or eight other claimants shall be permitted to go to the Court of Claims, prove their cases if they have good ones, and if they have not then the matter will be at an end, forever taken out of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. These vessels were constructed under contracts made by the Government with these parties. For the next succeeding six years these parties were entitled to go into the Court of Claims; but instead of doing so they preferred to present their claims to the Navy Department, which had the power of adjustment. On contracts amounting to $14,201,000 the Navy Department allowed them $5,302,847.94, in the neighborhood of 40 per cent., as extras upon the original contracts. Not content with that, these parties obtained the passage of an act of Congress, passed on the 2d of March, 1867, organizing a tribunal, so to speak——

Mr. KELLOGG. These parties did not do that.

Mr. HOLMAN. These parties—so the minority of the committee have reported—obtained the passage of that act organizing a tribunal under the Secretary of the Navy to inquire into what losses had been sustained by them in consequence of changes in their contracts, and because of delay occasioned by the act of the Government. Those are the terms of the act of March 2, 1867; and every gentleman must see that this act presented the case so as to enable these parties to have ample and complete justice.

The proper tribunal was organized under that act, consisting of three officers of the Navy Department. They reported that certain of these parties were entitled to additional compensation, amounting in the aggregate to $157,475.55; but they also reported that the other parties named were not entitled to receive any additional compensation, having sustained no loss that had not been already provided for by allowances made to them by the Navy Department under the provisions of the contracts, which were framed with reference to the contingencies of delays and alterations which might be made by the Government. But, sir, these parties did not go into the Court of Claims. They sought other tribunals; first, the Navy Department itself——

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not my friend know that these parties were never permitted to appear in the Court of Claims?

Mr. HOLMAN. They sought other tribunals—first the Navy Department itself, and secondly the tribunal organized under the act whose passage they themselves procured. They have received the money—have receipted in full. Yet they are still demanding $4,700,000 more.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, there were ayes 48, noes not counted.

So the bill was not passed.

SAINT CROIX AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 654) to extend the time for the completion of a railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake between townships 25 and 31 to the west end of Lake Superior, and to Bayfield in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a new land grant.

Mr. RUSK. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 46, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3341) for the equalization of bounties, &c., had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LOGAN, Mr. HAMLIN, and Mr. SPENCER.

NATIONAL PARK, ISLAND OF MACKINAC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 28) to set apart a certain portion of the island of Mackinac, in the Straits of Mackinac, within the State of Michigan, as a national park.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the rules be suspended and this bill be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the island of Mackinac, lying in the Straits of Mackinac, within the county of Mackinac, in the State of Michigan, as is now held by the United States under military reservation or otherwise, (excepting the Fort Mackinac and so much of the present reservation thereof as bounds it to the south on the village of Mackinac, and to the west, north, and east, respectively, by lines drawn north and south, east and west, at a distance from the present fort flag-staff of four hundred yards,) hereby is reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart as a national public park, or grounds, for health, comfort, and pleasure, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; and all persons who shall locate or settle upon or occupy the same, or any part thereof, except as herein provided, shall be considered trespassers and removed therefrom.

SEC. 2. That said public park shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of War, whose duty it shall be, as soon as practicable, to make and publish such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits, natural curiosities, or wonders within said park, and their retention in their natural condition. The Secretary may, in his discretion, grant leases, for building purposes, of small parcels of ground, at such places in said park as shall require the erection of buildings for the accommodation of visitors, for terms not exceeding ten years; all of the proceeds of said leases, and all other revenues derived from any source connected with said park, to be expended, under his direction, in the management of the same and in the construction of roads and bridle-paths therein. He shall provide against the wanton destruction of game or fish found within said park, and against their capture or destruction for any purposes of use or profit. He also shall cause all persons trespassing upon the same after the passage of this act to be removed therefrom, and generally shall be authorized to take all such measures as shall be necessary or proper to fully carry out the objects and purposes of this act.

SEC. 3. That any part of the park hereby created shall at all times be available for military purposes, either as a parade or drill ground, in time of peace, or for complete occupation in time of war, or whenever war is expected, and may also be used for the erection of any public buildings or works: Provided, That no person shall ever claim or receive of the United States any damage on account of any future amendment or repeal of this act, or the taking of said park, or any part thereof, for public purposes or use.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to say one word upon this bill. The policy of the Government in setting apart bodies of land as public national parks is one that should not be entered upon without proper consideration. The expense of maintaining these parks must steadily increase, as has been shown in connection with the Yellowstone Park already set apart by the Government. I think that the true policy to be adopted is that which was pursued with reference to the Yosemite Valley. Let this island of Mackinac be transferred to the State of Michigan, to be held in trust as a public park for the United States. It will thus be brought under legal control.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose that Michigan should do with reference to this park what California did with reference to the Yosemite Valley, sell it out to squatters?

Mr. HOLMAN. But the State of California never could have sold it out if my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had been as acute as he usually is in drawing up the terms of the law under which that trust was created.

Gentlemen must be aware that every year the expense of keeping up the Yellowstone Park is increasing; and it is certain to become ultimately a source of great outlay to the Government.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It has never cost the Government a dollar.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am speaking of the general policy of this kind of legislation. I do not object to setting apart this island, known as Mackinac, as a public park, yet I think the title should be vested in the State of Michigan for the benefit of the people of the United States and should not be held by the Government.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, this island of Mackinac with which so many members are acquainted, with the exception of that part occupied by the village of Mackinac and a few settlers, is now a military reservation. The objection to giving it to the State of Michigan to hold and control as a park would be to give the State control over a military reservation. The object of making it a park is that it may be preserved now and for all future time for the people of the United States. It is now one of the most common public resorts for all the people around the lakes in any of the northern waters, and if it be preserved as a park it will be preserved with its wonderful natural curiosities, its woods and drives. It will be preserved for the use of the people; for their health and pleasure.

I do not know of any possible objection to granting this reservation to be used as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States. The island commands the entrance from Lake Huron to Lake Michigan, the only point which controls that passage, and it should never be surrendered as a military reservation. Yet at the same time, if the public should go there for the benefit of their health and for their recreation as they do now, as it is the most common place of resort in the Northern States, there can be no objection to this transfer. It gives the public a better right than they now have under military officers. The military officers can now forbid the people going over these beautiful grounds and examining the natural curiosities which are there. The people of the North and the Northwest desire it should be set apart as a public park instead of being held solely as a military reservation under the control of whatever officer, captain or sergeant, may be in charge of the fort at Mackinac.

I have never heard a reasonable objection to the passage of this bill. I think it is in the interest of the people of the United States who desire to spend their summers there. For the people from the South, from Chicago, and from all the lake States it is a place of the most popular resort.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does it give anybody a job to put up a hotel?

Mr. CONGER. There is no job in it. There are large public houses there now, and thousands have received renewed health and strength from a sojourn on this beautiful island. Let it forever remain the beautiful national park of the upper lakes.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

OXYGEN GAS COMPANY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 856) to incorporate the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object.

The rules were not suspended, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof, and the bill was not passed.

ROSA VERTNER JEFFREYS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 878) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffreys.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rosa Vertner Jeffreys, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for the use of and damages done to her property in Lexington, Kentucky, by reason of occupation of the same by the military authorities of the United States in the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word in behalf of this bill, and if members will listen to me I think I can satisfy them of its justice. It is a little bill which has passed the Senate, allowing Mrs. Jeffreys $5,000 for the use of her residence in Lexington, Kentucky, for three years and a half. The property is proved by the testimony of military officers, of General Gilmore, General O. B. Wilcox, and General S. G. Burbridge, and others, that it was a valuable residence, worth $20,000, and was fully furnished when the military took possession of it. They occupied it for three years and a half as headquarters. When occupied, it was not where the war was going on. It was handsomely furnished, with a fine library and with personal property valued at $9,000, as the proof shows. The property was well worth $20,000 when they took possession of it, but when given up by the United States it had to be sold for only $9,000 because it had been so much abused while in the possession of the military authorities.

The Senate committee, after full investigation, say they could not allow for personal property destroyed while in use by the military authorities, nor could they allow for injury done to the building, although they admit that the damage was done; but after having received $1,600 for rent, they say Mrs. Jeffreys shall have $5,000. I believe double that amount should be allowed to her; but that is all this bill appropriates. It is only fair compensation, independent of the destruction of personal property and damage done to the building when in the use of the Government, for the use of the building.

I know the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] sees something difficult about it. There was no war at the time in that place. It was quiet and peaceable all the time of the occupancy by our officers. As the report shows, it is only a reasonable compensation, in addition to the $1,600 already paid, to pay Mrs. Jeffreys this $5,000 appropriated in this bill. If members will read the report, they will see that the building was worth $20,000, was handsomely furnished, and in good repair when taken possession of. The United States took possession of it and kept it against the will of this lady and her family for three years and a half. They were living in Rochester, New York, all the time and were not only loyal but as loyal as any man on this floor can pretend to be. It was used by the United States, and they could not have got the same property for far more than the Senate have allowed.

Mr. FIELD. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Does the gentleman from Kentucky have the report of the Senate committee upon this bill?

Mr. BECK. I have. I wish some gentleman would read it.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. Let it be read by the Clerk.

Mr. BECK. The Senate report is a very full one.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. If that report is to be read I ask that the report of the Committee on War Claims of the House be also read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES.) Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] rise to oppose the bill?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There is no one fact sufficiently proved to authorize the payment of this claim. During the war officers of the Army often chose to occupy houses at their own expense. It certainly does not appear that there ever was any authorized occupancy of the claimant's property for the benefit of or by authority of the Government.

This claim has been examined by the War Claims Committee, and there has been a report of the committee against it. There is no ground upon which Congress can properly undertake to examine this claim. The War Department and the accounting officers of the Treasury have, or at least had, full power to examine it, and this has been fully shown in the report made by the Committee on War Claims. This claimant has been paid as much as the military officers who occupied her property deemed proper, and the only question is whether Congress will now undertake to revise the judgment of the War Department upon this case. I have not recently looked into the report of the committee, and I cannot say that the claim has been examined by the War Department. But I know the proof shows that money has been paid to the claimant, some $1,700, if I remember right, for the use of this property, all that the proper officers deemed proper. I think it will be found that there is no evidence that there was any contract or use of this property for the Government. The property may have been occupied by officers who chose to do so for their own convenience; and if we undertake now in Congress to review the action of the officers who made payment upon claims like this there will be no end to them. We will invite a horde of claims here, and Congress, as every man knows, is the worst place in the world to undertake to review the action of or take the place of the proper officers in the investigation of claims.

The question being put on passing the bill, there were ayes 96, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

WASHINGTON CROSLAND.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of Washington Crosland.

The bill was read. It provides that there be paid to Washington Crosland, of Saint Louis, Missouri, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000, in satisfaction of all damages which accrued to him by reason of the construction of a railroad across his two lots of land in the city of Saint Louis by the United States for military purposes.

Mr. STONE. I move that the bill be passed.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PROTECTION OF TREES ON GOVERNMENT RESERVATIONS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 524) to protect ornamental and other trees on Government reservations and on lands purchased by the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX, (at a quarter to one o'clock a. m., Thursday, March 4.) I move to take a recess until nine o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the sundry civil appropriation bill will be here from the Committee on Appropriations in half an hour.

Mr. COX. I am willing to modify my motion so that the recess shall be until seven o'clock. It is the worst legislation that I ever saw that is being done to-night.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move to amend the motion by making the hour two o'clock.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move to amend by making it half past one o'clock.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The House should not take a recess until the sundry civil bill is reported for action.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am informed that the Committee on Appropriations will be ready in three-quarters of an hour to report that bill to the House.

Mr. COX. I will modify my motion so as to make the hour to which the House shall take a recess half past one o'clock.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, as modified, there were—ayes 38, noes 75; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and Mr. COX were appointed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. No one in this part of the Hall knows what we are asked to vote upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The House will come to order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a suggestion to the House. The sundry civil bill is now in the Committee on Appropriations. It is necessary that it be sent to a conference committee before the House takes any lengthy recess. In three-quarters of an hour we can have it here.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire also to make a suggestion. The committee of conference on the legislative appropriation bill have agreed. I suppose the bill will be very soon here from the Senate, and it is important that it should be acted on speedily. It is a voluminous bill, and will require a great deal of labor to engross it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. COX. I will if it is agreed that we do not to go to the Speaker's table again. If that is not agreed to I modify my motion so that the recess shall be for half an hour.

The question being taken on the motion that the House take a recess for half an hour, there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

LANDS IN UTAH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 425) for the restoration to market of certain lands in the Territory of Utah.

Many members objected to the bill.

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

E. LAWS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 710) for the relief of E. Laws, chief engineer, United States Navy.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky. I object to that bill.

Mr. MYERS. This bill was drawn by the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is all right. It is approved by the Secretary of the Navy, by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and I hope it will be passed. There is no possible objection to the bill.

The question was put, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

JACKSONVILLE, PENSACOLA AND MOBILE RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 608) granting the right of way through the public lands to construct and maintain a railroad, (the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad.)

Mr. SENER. I object to that bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would say that this bill received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on the Public Lands, and conforms fully and entirely to the previous laws that have been adopted by the House.

Mr. KASSON. Is twenty acres the usual allowance or ten acres?

Mr. DUNNELL. Twenty acres.

Mr. WALLS. I hope this bill will pass; it grants a simple right of way.

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and on a division there were—ayes 46, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. COX. Is it too late to say a word?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the bill.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. BURCHARD were appointed.

Mr. COX. I believe five minutes is allowed for each side, and I would ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] whether the right of way is the only thing granted by this bill?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is, with the exception of the necessary lands for depots, &c.

Mr. SENER. I withdraw my objection to the bill.

There being no further objection, the bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICTS, NEW YORK.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1294) to fix the salaries of the judges of the northern and southern districts of New York.

The bill, which was read, provides that from and after the 1st day of April, 1875, the salaries of the judges of the northern and southern districts of New York shall be $6,000 per annum.

Mr. SENER. I object to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to say that this bill passed the Judiciary Committee of the House after the most careful examination. These two districts in New York have two judges, who only receive $4,000 a year and are employed all the time, while of the States judges one receives $14,000 and one $10,000 a year. It is absolutely shameful to have two judges of the United States courts receiving such small salaries in proportion to those paid to the judges of the State courts.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to the consideration of this bill because it is not to be found upon the Calendar.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is on there.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. But its consideration now takes some other bill out of place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) The Chair will state that through some error of the Clerks this bill had got out of its order; but no objection was made to its consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If there is no further objection, I will not pursue the debate.

Mr. MCCRARY. I must object to the selection of one or two judges in the country to the exclusion of all others for the purpose of raising their salaries. The district judge in the State of Iowa receives only $2,500 a year. There is but one district in the State, and unless gentlemen will yield for an amendment to include that district judge I shall be compelled very reluctantly to oppose the bill, because it is neither fair nor just that one or two judges should be selected to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. SENER. If I am not mistaken this judge now gets $4,500.

Mr. MCCRARY. If the gentleman will yield to me to move an amendment that the district judge of Iowa shall receive $5,000 I will not object to the bill.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I wish to have the salary of the district judge of Indiana increased.

Mr. CESSNA. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] believe for one moment that if his amendment should be allowed to go on the bill it would do him or anybody else any good, or would it result in anything but the defeat of this bill, which is right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further debate is in order.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 46, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask if this bill is on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair called attention to the fact that it had been presented out of its order and asked if there was any objection, and there was none.

Mr. RANDALL. The House probably had no objection to it if it was on the Calendar, but I have since been informed that it was not on the Calendar at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill came up properly. I asked unanimous consent to discharge the Judiciary Committee from the consideration of two bills and put them upon the table. One has been passed and this is the other.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair submitted to the House the question of considering this bill out of its order, and there was no objection. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. MCCRARY, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 108, noes 39.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on this bill. Even upon the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that he had permission for it to go on the table it should be placed at the bottom. It has been put near the top, if not at the top, and it is keeping other bills back and not fairly treating them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why did not the gentleman make his objection a little sooner?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move to put the bill back in its place.

Mr. RANDALL. The House ought to have respect enough for itself to rebuke such conduct as this.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 79.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not desire to waste time in calling the yeas and nays if the gentleman will consent——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Debate is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will consent that it shall go to the bottom——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It may as well go to the bottomless pit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 84, nays 102, not voting 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barry, Bromberg, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Carpenter, Caulfield, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Comingo, Creamer, Davis, Donnan, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Finck, Foster, Gooch, Gunter, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hodges, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hynes, Kasson, Kellogg, Elfingham Lawrence, Lawson, Lowndes, Lynch, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, McNulta, Merriam, Myers, Negley, Packer, Page, Parsons, Perry, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

During the vote,

Mr. SOUTHARD said: The gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. HAMILTON, is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. LANSING. I do not know how they would vote on this question.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I presume this bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. If it does, it must go to the bottom.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. At the bottom, of course.

Mr. SPEER. It is not on the Calendar at all.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It was surreptitiously brought in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4858) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to sign a certificate of extension of letters-patent No. 28,470, granted to Frederick T. Grant, May 29, 1860, upon a sliver machine.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3884) granting a pension to Mary C. Toy.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter; and

An act (H. R. No. 4324) to change the name of the Second National Bank of Jamestown, New York.

Mr. DARRALL, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 786) for the relief of Samuel S. Potter;

An act (S. No. 1328) to amend sections 1675, 1676, 1681, and 1682 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

An act (S. No. 1339) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4529) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANNING, from the same committee, also reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor;

An act (H. R. No. 3685) for the relief of George A. Schreiner;

An act (H. R. No. 4747) supplementary to the acts in relation to immigration; and

An act (H. R. No. 4833) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and remit certain taxes and penalties claimed to be due from mining and other corporations, and for other purposes.

MARY C. TOY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3884) granting a pension to Mary C. Toy.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out "John B. Toy" and insert "John D. Toy;" strike out "66" and insert "16."

Mr. COTTON. "Sixteen" is the number of the regiment; there was a misdescription of the regiment as the sixty-sixth regiment.

The amendments were concurred in.

COMMISSIONERS TO VIENNA EXPOSITION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 623) to enable the Secretary of State to pay salaries to certain of the commissioners to the Vienna exposition, appointed under authority of joint resolution approved February 14, 1873.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any balance now remaining unexpended of the moneys appropriated in joint resolution approved February 14, 1873, entitled "Joint resolution to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the international exposition to be held at Vienna in 1873," the sum of $500 to each of the six practical artisans, five scientific men, and four honorary commissioners, appointed under authority of said joint resolution, who, in addition to undertaking reports upon special subjects at said exposition, either served upon international juries or were detained in Vienna by reason of assisting in the arrangement of the American department of the exposition, or the performance of other duties imposed upon them by the State Department for a period of more than seventy-five days, as shown by the records on file in that Department.

Mr. MYERS. I desire merely to say that this bill is recommended by the Secretary of State; that it has been approved by the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and that it appropriates no money out of the Treasury. It gives to the fifteen artisans and scientific men who were appointed to go to Vienna, at a salary of $1,000, $500 more out of the money already appropriated, and for the reason stated in the bill—that in consequence of the dismissal of other commissioners, they were called upon to perform duties not originally contemplated. The bill merely allows $500 each to those who served seventy-five days, and who in addition to that made reports. They had to sit upon juries; they staid in Vienna when the weather was very oppressive; and it is to be borne in mind also that that is the most expensive capital in Europe. These men were mechanics or artisans who could not well afford to go, and to whom we allowed $1,000 each, which barely paid their expenses. The Secretary of State writes urging that this allowance be made. It is a very small matter.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This bill is in the nature of "back pay." These persons went to that exposition under a statute which allowed them $1,000 each and no more; that was the limit. They now come and ask $500 extra apiece.

Mr. MYERS. It is the Secretary of State who asks it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is strictly and entirely "back pay."

The question being taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, it was not agreed to.

PAYMASTERS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. On last Monday a bill was passed in relation to the Pay Department of the Army. There seems to be some doubt about the construction of that act. The intention was to fix the number of paymasters at fifty, and to open that corps to promotion. It seems that the provision opening the corps to promotion is not as definite as it should be. I therefore ask unanimous consent to introduce and have passed a joint resolution explanatory of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which objection can be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution explanatory of an act entitled "An act fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States," approved March 2, 1875.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the intent and meaning of an act entitled "An act fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States," approved March 2, 1875, was to authorize the appointment of such additional number of paymasters with the rank of major as will make the total number of paymasters with the rank of major fifty, and no more; and so much of section 1194 of the Revised Statutes as applies to the Pay Department be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the effect of this?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It is explanatory of the act passed the other day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it not have the effect of making an increase in this corps?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Not at all.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 162) was read three times, and passed.

Mr. STORM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. DURHAM. I object.

Mr. CREAMER. I move that we take a recess until nine o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was rejected.

PASSED ASSISTANT PAYMASTER E. MELLACH, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 898) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Passed Assistant Paymaster E. Mellach, United States Navy.

The bill, which was read, directs the accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States, in settling the accounts of E. Mellach, passed assistant paymaster, United States Navy, to credit him with all stoppages charged against him, amounting to $25,104.98, and to allow him his pay from the 2d of May, 1872, to the 7th of April, 1874.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has that bill been considered by any committee of this House?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. That bill, having passed the Senate unanimously, having previously been reported unanimously from the Committee on Naval Affairs in that body, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs in this House, and I have been unanimously instructed by that committee to move its passage under a suspension of the rules. I have the report of the Senate in my hand.

Several MEMBERS. We will pass the bill; it is all right.

The rules were suspended and the bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 912) to annex certain lands to reservation No. 2, occupied by the Department of Agriculture.

The bill, which was read, provides that the public gound which lies immediately north of reservation No. 2, now in the occupancy of the Department of Agriculture, made by the filling up of the canal, be, and the same is hereby, attached to and shall hereafter be a part of the said reservation No. 2, in the occupancy of the said Department of Agriculture.

The rules were suspended, and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 4445) to incorporate the trustees of Louise Home, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3923) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the Joseph Warren Monument Association of Boston, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3923) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the Joseph Warren Association of Boston, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill:
Provided, The same can be done without detriment to the service.

The amendment was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3504) to provide for deductions from terms of sentence of United States prisoners;

An act (H. R. No. 2925) to transfer the county of Perry, in the State of Tennessee, from the western to the middle judicial district of the United States in said State;

An act (H. R. No. 4744) to punish certain larcenies and receivers of stolen goods;

An act (H. R. No. 3379) for the further security of the navigation of the Mississippi River; and

An act (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 867) to correct a clerical error in the act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, approved June 8, 1872.

The preamble recites that in the third session of the Forty-second Congress the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 984) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, submitted as part of their report the recommendation that the second proviso in the amendment of the House of Representatives adding provisos to the end of the bill be stricken out and the following words be inserted: "And provided further, That the said Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company is hereby recognized as a lawful corporation from the date of its incorporation under the laws of Colorado, and all the powers, privileges, and franchises by said laws conferred upon said company are hereby expressly ratified, confirmed, and legalized as existing from said date of incorporation; but beyond such recognition, ratification, and confirmation of and to said company this act shall not be construed as affirming or denying the rights of Territories to pass laws for the incorporation of railway companies;" which report of said committee of conference was concurred in by both Houses; and that in transcribing the bill the said second proviso in the amendment of the House of Representatives was not stricken out, and the above quoted words were not inserted and do not appear in the law upon the statute-books.

The bill provides that the said words above quoted shall be considered and taken as they were intended to be, and they are hereby made a part of said act approved June 8, 1872.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Senate amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. My colleague yields to me to have taken from the table Senate bill No. 1237. I desire to explain that this bill provides——

Mr. DURHAM. I object.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will greatly facilitate business if gentlemen will send for the printed copies of the bill as passed by the Senate now on the table of the Doorkeeper. I am sorry to say there is a bad botch in the print, which makes the numbers after the first six or seven of them utterly worthless.

The Senate have sent us one hundred and twenty-four amendments to this bill. The Committee on Appropriations have carefully gone over them, and recommend concurrence in about one-third of them, non-concurrence in almost all the rest, and concurrence, with amendments, in two cases only. As there are several very important questions for the House to determine we have to follow the amendments seriatim, and I hope we will have as much quiet as possible.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments of the Senate and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations thereon. The recommendations of the committee were agreed to without debate except in the following cases.

The Clerk read the first amendment of the Senate, as follows:

After line 33 insert the following:

For printing at the Government Printing Office five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the use of the Commissioner, $2,500.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committe on Appropriations recommend concurrence, with an amendment making the number of copies twenty thousand; ten thousand for the use of the House, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and five thousand for the Commissioner of Education. The committee in this follow exactly what was agreed to by the House in the resolution adopted by the House a few days ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will concur in the Senate amendment without the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations considered they were instructed by the action of the House a few days ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the first question be simply whether we shall concur in the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. GARFIELD. The motion to concur is proposed to be amended by concurring with an amendment. The question will be on concurring in the amendment with an amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations is in accordance with the practice which uniformly of late years has been followed by the House of Representatives and with the resolution which passed the House a few days ago without a dissenting voice.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no great demand for this work. When the Senate is disposed to cut down the printing we should encourage them by concurring. I insist on a division.

The question being put, the Senate amendment was concurred in with the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read the second amendment of the Senate, as follows:

In line 80 strike out after the words "by donation" the words "or purchase;" so that the paragraph will read:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it advisable, to acquire by donation, in behalf of the United States, the right to use and occupy sites for life-saving or life-boat stations and houses of refuge, the establishment of which has been, or shall hereafter be, authorized by Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence. This matter was examined by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who had charge of that portion of the bill, and it was found necessary in some cases that the sites for life-saving stations should be purchased.

The amendment was not concurred in.

The Clerk read the third and fourth amendments of the Senate, as follows:

In line 144, after the words "Secretary of the Treasury," strike out "in his discretion may" and insert the word "shall."

In line 147, after the words "bank-note engravers as," strike out the word "shall" and insert "may."

The paragraph would then read:

For the purchase of engravers' tools, dies, rolls, and plates, and for machinery and repairs of the same, $50,000: Provided, That the above-named notes, currency, and other securities of the United States be executed with not less than three plate printings: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have executed one or two of such printings by such responsible and capable and experienced bank-note companies or bank-note engravers as may contract for the same at the lowest cost to the Government and at prices not greater than those heretofore paid for the same class of work; no company or establishment executing more than one printing upon the same note or obligation, and the final printing and finishing to be executed in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the House will non-concur.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a single word in explanation of those two amendments, which are really one in effect. The language as passed by the House was:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may have executed one or two of such printings by such responsible and capable bank-note companies or bank-note engravers as shall contract.

The Secretary of the Treasury says he desires not to have the burden of that discretion left to him, but that whatever distribution of this work Congress proposes to have made he desires it shall be mandatory on him. The Senate therefore says he shall have one or two printings done outside by such companies as may contract for the work.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the amendment not give him discretion?

Mr. GARFIELD. It gives him discretion between one or two, but for none below one or above two.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Then it leaves it at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to have two printings made outside if he sees fit but obligatory on him to have one?

Mr. GARFIELD. It makes it obligatory on him to have one, but he may have two.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Is that in consideration of the fulfillment of the contract with the Columbian Bank-note Company of this city? Or is it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury again to put it into the hands of the New York bank-note companies?

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it the language does not limit him to any company. There is no company alluded to here whatever.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. But it makes it obligatory that there shall be one printing done outside.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does it confine the work to this District?

Mr. GARFIELD. It does not. An amendment of that nature was reported in the Senate but was voted down.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman say that the Secretary of the Treasury wants this amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say this, that the Secretary of the Treasury wants to have the matter fixed and not left at his discretion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think we had better non-concur.

Mr. LEWIS. As the gentleman from Ohio has stated the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, I wish to understand from him clearly and distinctly whether the Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that none of the printing should be done outside?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not authorized to speak for the Secretary of the Treasury on that point. I only say that he desires to have this law, whatever it is, mandatory on him.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Is there any reason why any portion of the work should be done outside of this District?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is the opinion of the Committee on Banking and Currency that a portion of the work ought to be done outside of the District. This House is very much divided, the Committee on Appropriations are divided, and the Committee on Banking and Currency are divided upon this question, but the majority opinion seems to be that a portion of the work should be done outside of the District, and that opinion the Committee on Appropriations have tried to realize in agreeing to this amendment.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Is it in order to make an amendment to this amendment to provide that the work shall be done within the District?

Mr. RANDALL. It would be in order to move to concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I propose then to concur in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment to this effect: that no portion of the work shall be done outside but shall be done within the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That amendment ought not to pass without consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. It ought not to pass because it excludes competition between the various other cities as to the price that shall be paid for the work done outside of the District.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There is but one company here, and you might as well elect the Columbian Bank-note Company to do this work by a direct vote.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and being put there were, on a division—ayes 127, noes 49.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays, and 16 members voted therefor.

Mr. STRAIT. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only 6 members voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now call for tellers upon the question.

Tellers were not ordered, only 25 members voting therefor.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The Clerk read the sixth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Insert after the word "dollars," in line 173, on page 8, the following:

Provided, That the compensation of the counsel of the United States provided for by section 5 of the act of Congress creating a court of commissioners of Alabama claims, approved June 23, 1874, shall not exceed $8,000 per annum.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in that amendment, and for the reason that they are not sufficiently satisfied what salary should be paid to this counsel. The House passed a provision the other day giving him $10,000.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman think the amount ought to be more than $8,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. A provision passed through the committee placing it at $10,000, but by some blunder it was left out in engrossing the bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope we shall concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I want to say one word upon this question. This is a very important matter, requiring from the Government counsel ability of a first-class order. The professional ability, the professional labor, the professional time bestowed upon it in prosecuting these claims would bring to the person employed, I venture to say, ten times the amount that it is proposed to pay here. The employment is constant and continuous. The court is in session all the time. The cases are large and the items in them enormous, and the Government counsel needs to be vigilant. His responsibility is undivided. I do not believe that there is any law officer of the Government aside from the Attorney-General who has so much responsibility resting upon him as the counsel for the Government in these cases.

Mr. SPEER. The Attorney-General has $8,000 a year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Attorney-Generel has assistants in every quarter. There is scarcely an important point anywhere where the Attorney-General has not an assistant; but the responsibility and labor of the Government counsel before this court of commissioners is undivided.

Mr. SPEER. I would ask the gentleman if the present counsel did not serve as Postmaster-General for $8,000 a year?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Undoubtedly; he did.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And does he not have to pay for assistants?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is not a dollar that he will have to pay if this be passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will he have nothing to pay?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Not a dollar.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does the gentleman from Maine consider the present counsel a lawyer of first-class ability?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman from Maryland wants to know if I consider the present counsel of first-class ability. Well, I have not had that training in the law and have not that knowledge of the law that would enable me to judge what is the first-class ability which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] possesses. I believe that the present counsel is a good lawyer. I believe that he is doing his duty. I believe that he is contending for the rights of the Government. I believe that he is making the best of every case that is presented before the commission. Whether or not he has been so unfortunate as to secure the withering censure of the gentleman from Maryland I do not know. If it had been known that he had, he would not undoubtedly have been put in this place.

Mr. MERRIAM. I have only one word to say, and that is to correct the statement made by the chairman. I had this provision put into the bill, and it was not $10,000, as the gentleman says, but it was that the maximum should not exceed $10,000. While we are on this point, I will ask the chairman a question. I understand that Mr. Creswell, late postmaster-general, is one of the commissioners of the Freedman's Bank, and receives $3,000 per annum for that. I want to know if that is allowable under the law, or will he resign as commissioner provided we fix the compensation at this sum?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Allow me to state to the gentleman that the counsel for the Government in this case is perfectly willing to give up the other matter; and if the House chooses to put a clause in to the effect that the officer here employed by the Government shall hold no other office under the Government and receive no other compensation, I for one will not object to it. But it is not good policy in so important a matter as this to be niggardly and to seek to limit the officer to a sum from which he cannot pay for assistants and cannot do his whole duty to the Government.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to state to the House what was the idea of the Committee on the Judiciary when they fixed this salary. Here was a large number of cases to be brought before this commission; there are thirteen hundred and twenty of them; and the question was, how shall these cases be carried on on the part of the Government? How much work would have to be done, where it would have to be done, in what part of the country it would have to be done, under what circumstances it would have to be done, nobody could tell. Therefore the Committee on the Judiciary put this provision in the bill which has passed into a law, that the court after looking at each case should decide exactly what the counsel for the Government ought to have, and should decide exactly what the counsel for the defendant ought to have, so that both sides might be protected from exorbitant fees. Counsel for the Government of course must be paid for such clerical and other assistance as he ought to have. No man on earth could prepare twenty cases a day and then try them for four hours a day besides, and do it all alone. There is no other provision of law, if we pass this, by which he can have any compensation.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that a portion of the time be given to those opposed to this provision.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will yield first to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. I do not often agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts who has just addressed the House, [Mr. BUTLER,] but on this occasion I do. Here is a very large sum in the hands of the Government to be attacked by claimants from all parts of the country, assisted by able counsel. You must defend it either by a salaried officer or by an officer receiving fees. Now, to pay fees would be vastly more expensive than to pay an officer a salary of $10,000 a year. If he is a competent man, as I have no doubt he is, $10,000 a year is not too much. You cannot expect to get first-rate men for less, and you ought to have a first-rate man for this.

A MEMBER. You get members of Congress for $5,000 a year.

Mr. POTTER. You can get persons to come to Congress for $5,000 a year. But do they come here for their salaries alone, or for the honor? How is it with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] and other members here?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not there something honorable in being counsel of the United States in reference to this $15,000,000? Does it not confer great distinction on a man, and make him a very prominent lawyer?

Mr. POTTER. When the place is offered to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] he can make that calculation for himself. I think $10,000 a year is not too much, and I intend to vote for that sum.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now desire——

Mr. SPEER. I trust the gentleman will yield.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am compelled to take the floor.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I yield the floor to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPEER. I desire a few minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPEER. Give me five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Be as brief as possible; take four minutes.

Mr. SPEER. I have nothing to say against the ability of the present counsel, Mr. Creswell. But he is at present one of the commissioners of the Freedman's Bank, appointed by the President under existing law. He is also president of a national bank recently removed to this city from Hagerstown, Maryland. He is trustee of the Feedman's Bank, president of a national bank, and now counsel for the United States in the Alabama claims. I suppose that at this day he is in receipt of from $15,000 to $30,000 of professional salary.

Mr. CESSNA. Of what bank is he president?

Mr. SPEER. He has been recently elected president of a bank removed to this city, from which position Mr. Groom, of Maryland, has resigned.

Mr. CESSNA. That has been very recently.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Creswell resigned his position of Postmaster-General with a salary of $8,000 a year for the purpose, as I am informed and as I believe, of accepting this other business. And when the Senate of the United States has said that $8,000 is enough, I think, in view of all the facts, that their judgment on this question should be accepted by this House. When we are asking the people to bear additional burdens, when Congress is asked to pass additional tax bills, we should not give any man a salary of $8,000, or $10,000 a year for services which can be had for less money than would obtain the services of gentlemen of the best legal talent in this land.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not pay one cent towards the salary of this officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield one minute to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. STARKWEATHER.]

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is on important matter in two views: First, as to the large number of cases; and, second, as to the amount of money involved. It seems to me that we ought to fix the sum; that we ought not to leave it indefinite. It would be difficult for the court to adjust the amount. I think we should either fix the salary at $10,000 or else let it go to a committee of conference to be arranged. Those cases in which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] was appointed counsel on behalf of the United States involved only some two or three million dollars; yet he received a salary of $10,000 I believe.

Mr. HUBBELL. And eight dollars a day besides.

Mr. POTTER. And saved the Government a great deal of money.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think the pay of this officer should not be less than was allowed the counsel in that case. I believe it best that in these cases involving $15,000,000 we should give such compensation as will enable the counsel to attend entirely to this business. It seems to me that the amount fixed for Mr. HALE'S salary is the sum that should be fixed here.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Let me correct my friend. The British claims before the British-American mixed commission amounted to $90,000,000.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. No matter how that may be; the duties of counsel in connection with those cases could not have been more burdensome, could not have required more talent and constant attention than the duties in these cases. I think therefore that we should either leave this question in such a shape that the committee of conference can fix the amount at $10,000 or else we should fix it ourselves at that sum.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I have no knowledge in regard to who is or may be counsel in these matters for the United States; and certainly I should be unwilling, unless there were abundant reason for it, to asperse the legal qualifications of a son of Maryland. I am satisfied that if nothing else would induce the gentleman who might be counsel in these matters to act up to the line of his entire duty as required by his employment, the fact that he drew his inspiration from Maryland would be all-sufficient. Therefore I am willing to commit this case to his hands; and as able lawyers all around me assert that the sum of $10,000 is fair for the services that will be required, I will not object to the payment of the same.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would remind the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that unless we make more rapid progress in the consideration of these amendments we shall have to suspend the rules and act on the amendments en masse.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to say but one word. There may be a misapprehension here as to where the money comes from to pay this counsel. It does not come from the United States Treasury. It comes from the fund; it is to be settled by the tribunal itself. Now, it has been said here that this officer has already been receiving a large sum; but as I understand the tribunal has not passed upon any of the services rendered by the gentleman representing the Government, but is waiting to see the extent of the work and responsibility before settling the compensation. Up to this time he has not received a dollar.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether this gentleman will be furnished with an office, with clerk hire and assistants, in addition to his salary?

Mr. GARFIELD. Nothing of that kind. If we fix his pay here it leaves him nothing else. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment was concurred in, there being ayes 102, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

Strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" strike out "Clerk" and insert "Senate and twenty-five copies for the use of the House;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to have prepared for the Public Printer copies of all the summary reports of the commissioners of claims in cases reported to Congress as disallowed under the act of March 3, 1871, of which twenty-five copies shall be printed and bound for the use of the Senate and twenty-five copies for the use of the House, $1,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House provided for printing fifty copies for the House. The Senate has changed the provision so as to give us twenty-five and themselves twenty-five. We recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

In line 373 strike out the word "successively" and insert the words "as needed for immediate use," so that the clause will read as follows:

To pay on behalf of the United States, as a portion of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $1,060,000, only to be drawn as needed for immediate use.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Why?

Mr. GARFIELD. A portion of this money is needed at once and must be rendered immediately available.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will non-concur in all amendments of this character. This provision relates to moneys for the District of Columbia, the Government proposing to pay a portion and a portion to be paid from taxes collected by the board of commissioners from property-holders in this District. Now, what we want is this: as we pay a dollar that at the same time there shall be a dollar paid on the part of the people here; in other words, that they shall pay their proportion. If struck out it may occur, as it has occurred repeatedly before, the Government will be made to pay as in similar cases it has been made to do, before all it is required to pay for the year, and subsequently we will find we have not secured from the property-holders the amount of taxes collected from them, the sum which should come from them as their proportion.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's purpose is a good one, but the word "successively" is vague and does not describe the thing at all.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. That is a misprint; "concurrently" is the word, and not "successively."

Mr. RANDALL. I move to concur, with an amendment to insert "concurrently" instead of "successively."

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no connection at all making that clear or applicable. The Senate say instead of "successively" it will be better to insert the words "as needed for immediate use," so that they cannot anticipate, so that they cannot draw it out. It seems to me in this amendment the Senate has acted wisely.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has stated my objection exactly. They will want immediately all the money we will give them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that. They ask only for $300,000.

Mr. RANDALL. They ask for $300,000 at once.

Mr. GARFIELD. That amount of the appropriation is to be made available from the passage of this act.

Mr. RANDALL. I say when we appropriate ten or twenty or fifty thousand dollars it should be coupled with a provision that there shall also be paid from the taxes collected a like sum. Otherwise you will have this District coming here at the end of the year asking more because it has not been collected from the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 23.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The fifteenth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

And $300,000 of this sum shall be available from the passage of this act.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend concurrence in that amendment, as it provides for making $300,000 of the money available at once.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is not that to supply a deficiency? Is it not giving on the part of the Government $300,000 more for the current fiscal year?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.

The amendment was concurred in.

The sixteenth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

To pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds issued under the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," $365,000: Provided, That certificates for claims presented and allowed under the sixth section of the act aforesaid shall be presented for conversion, as provided by the seventh section of said act within ninety days from the passage of this act, and, as to certificates of date subsequent to the passage of this act, within ninety days from the date of such certificate; and if not so presented, the privilege of thus exchanging shall not be exercised by any holder of such claim; and the sinking-fund commissioners of the District of Columbia are prohibited from issuing any bonds under the seventh section of the act hereinbefore referred to in exchange for any certificate unless presented within the time herein specified; and the salary of the commissioner of the sinking fund, acting as treasurer thereof, shall be $1,000 per annum.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is an appropriation of $365,000 to pay the interest on the bonds of this District, and the committee recommend concurrence. There is a long letter addressed to the chairman of the committee which we had not time to consider, and we have therefore moved non-concurrence.

Mr. SPEER. I want to have it understood that the House unanimously instruct the committee on this subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. You cannot do that to a committee of conference.

The amendment was concurred in.

The seventeenth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

And no work of art not the property of the United States shall be exhibited in the Capitol, nor shall any room in the Capitol be used for private studios or works of art, without permission from the Joint Committee on the Library, given in writing; and it shall be the duty of the architect of the Capitol extension to carry these provisions into effect.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend concurrence, and for one reason which the House will appreciate. The old Hall of the House has by a strange freak of the law been placed under the control of General Babcock, Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, while the rest of the building is under the Architect of the Capitol. There ought not to be two parties controlling this Capitol.

The amendment was concurred in.

The eighteenth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

That section eight of the act approved June 23, 1874, "making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," be and the same is hereby, amended as follows: Insert the word "ounce" in lieu of the words "two ounces."

Mr. GARFIELD. This is a change of postage in regard to a certain kind of merchandise and meets the concurrence of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was concurred in.

The nineteenth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to rent, furnish, and keep suitable buildings, with grounds appurtenant, at Peking, for the use of the legation in China, at an annual cost not exceeding $5,000; that the period of such lease shall be for two or more years, and with renewals, as the Secretary of State shall determine; and that the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, therefor.

Mr. GARFIELD. That was passed in the deficiency appropriation bill. If passed in that bill it will be struck out of this.

The amendment was concurred in.

The twentieth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

To pay the clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, $2,220.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The twenty-first amendment of the Senate was as follows:

That hereafter the salary of the supervising surgeon-general of the United States marine-hospital service shall be paid out of the marine-hospital fund, at the rate of $4,000 per year; and the supervising surgeon-general shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be non-concurrence in this amendment of the Senate. The present law fixes the salary at $2,000 a year. This amendment contemplates a very large increase. It is thought by the shipping interest that the tax is now oppressive. I think it will be admitted by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] whom I now see rising from his seat, that $2,000 is a pretty respectable salary. And then it is proposed that this increase of salary shall be paid out of this amount, which will have to be increased by excessive charges upon those connected with our commercial marine. It seems to me wholly unjustifiable. I trust this increase of salary will not be allowed. There is no necessity or excuse for it.

Mr. CONGER. This is a self-sustaining institution. The money for the marine-hospital service is raised from the vessel-owners and the sailors generally, a part of it being taken from the monthly wages of the sailors and a certain amount paid by the vessel-owners. For a long number of years that service has been unfortunate because it had no efficient head, no superintendent suitable for the office, which was divided among different officers. In passing the amended law, which provided for an increased payment per sailor, it was designed that there should be an officer who should superintend the whole marine-hospital service of the United States and be an efficient officer. There have been great reforms already under the officer now in charge. But the salary is entirely inadequate to command the services of a man of the knowledge and administrative ability required for that service. I am firmly of the opinion that an increase of his salary to $4,000 will be for the benefit of the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it proposed to make any change in the superintendency?

Mr. CONGER. It is not. But any superintendent competent to manage such an extensive service should have a larger salary than is now attached to the office.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did not the gentleman now holding the office seek it two years ago at a salary of $2,000, and has he not held it at that from that time to this?

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman will remember that the Committee on Commerce have repeatedly recommended an increase of the salary, and probably it was with the hope of that increase that the gentleman has continued in that service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to concur in the amendment with an amendment striking out $4,000 and inserting $2,000, the present salary.

The question being taken on the motion to concur with an amendment, there were—ayes 12, noes 96.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that there shall be a quorum on any increase of salary.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will insert $3,000 in his amendment, I will agree to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. This gentleman begged for the office at $2,000 only two years ago. I agree, however, to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, and modify my amendment by making the amount $3,000.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment with the amendment as modified, there were ayes 117, noes not counted.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in with an amendment.

The fortieth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Strike out these words:

To enable and authorize the Department of Justice to aid the Commissioner of the General Land Office to recover certain lands, and the rents and profits thereof, known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California, as provided in the resolution passed by the House of Representatives on the 26th of January, 1875, $5,000, or so much as may be necessary therefor.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend non-concurrence, because the House had expressed its judgment in favor of this appropriation. Personally I am in favor of concurrence.

Mr. SMITH. I move to concur.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Here is the New Idria again. Let us see if we cannot get this property somehow for the United States.

The question being taken on concurring in the Senate amendment, there were—ayes 56, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 38.

Before the negative vote was completed,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I do not call for further count.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

The forty-first amendment of the Senate was as follows:

In line 887 strike out "$50,000" and insert "$40,000;" so the paragraph will read:
For surveying the public lands in Montana Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in. Nearly all the surveys in Montana are inside the grant to the Northern Pacific Railway. A settler cannot get lands. The House agreed to an appropriation of $50,000 for surveying the public lands in Montana, and I hope it will adhere to its action.

The question being put, the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The Clerk read the forty-second amendment, as follows:

In line 891, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000;" so that the paragraph will read:
For surveying the public lands in Nebraska, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. KASSON. I think we had better concur.

Mr. CONGER. This is one of the States where great numbers of settlers are going to acquire lands and homes. It is right that lands should be surveyed for those who desire to settle upon them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend non-concurrence. In conference we may be willing, perhaps, to increase the amount somewhat, but not to put it up so high as $100,000.

Mr. KASSON. Proper provision should be made for surveys in those States where there are unoccupied public lands.

The question being put, the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The fifty-second amendment of the Senate was as follows:

After line 1003 insert the following:
And the telegraph companies having offices in the Capitol are directed to take from the Capitol grounds and the streets around the same all telegraph poles, and connect these lines with the Capitol by means of cables laid under ground; and further, that the Washington and Georgetown and the Metropolitan Railway Companies are directed to take up such portions of their tracks as may come in the way of the improvement of the Capitol grounds and relay the same as may be directed by the officers in charge of the improvements of the Capitol grounds. And the Architect of the Capitol is hereby directed to move from the Capitol grounds all stables, workshops, and other buildings which may be in the way of the improvements of said grounds.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does this compel the railroad companies to take up the tracks from the Capitol grounds?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is precisely what it declares.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to that. There are some gentlemen fortunate enough to be able to come here in their own carriages and drive under the archways to the very doors of the Capitol. Those who have their own carriages can approach the Capitol as they choose. Those unfortunate enough not to have carriages are very willing to come up in the railroad cars to get as near the Capitol in that way as they can. If the object is to remove these tracks from the Capitol grounds entirely, I object to it, although I am objecting to it on behalf only of a few members who are not able to sport their own carriages.

The question being taken, the amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read the fifty-sixth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For the extension of the building for the Government Hospital for the Insane, $125,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now I desire to say a single word to the committee. I gave notice to the committee when they were debating this bill before that if that amendment was made in regard to soldiers from all parts of the country, it would be necessary for us to make a very large appropriation to extend this building; and it seems that what I said has become true very soon. The Senate here make an appropriation of $125,000 to extend this building. The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence in that amendment and propose to leave it to a subsequent Congress, and to confine the institution for the present to those who belong to the Army or belonged to the Army at the time they became insane.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The extension of the building here proposed is for a separate building for female patients; and we had very few female soldiers in the Army.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk read the sixtieth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For the National Association for the Relief of the Colored Women and Children of the District of Columbia, $10,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. We recommend non-concurrence in that amendment because we do not know enough about it. Perhaps it ought to be passed, but we prefer that the matter should be referred to the committee of conference.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The Clerk read the sixty-third amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out the following proviso:
Provided, That no money hereby appropriated, or any unexpended balance of former appropriations for the erection of military telegraph lines, shall be expended upon any line that cannot be completed by such appropriations herein or already made.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. HANCOCK. I hope the House will concur in the amendment of the Senate. This paragraph relates to an appropriation for constructing telegraph lines and affording telegraphic communication between the posts on the frontier of Texas. It is very strongly recommended by the Secretary of War, and a considerable amount of work has already been done. Material has been purchased and is on the ground, and much of the work has been completed. This appropriation is estimated for by the officers of the signal stations at $55,000 as the amount necessary to complete the entire work of twelve hundred miles in extent. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for this work at the last session of Congress, so that the entire work will cost $155,000. The remainder of the appropriation of $88,000 is for lines in Arizona and New Mexico, Now, this proviso, as the Secretary of War has communicated to the Senate to-day and to some members of the Committee on Appropriations, would arrest the progress of the work, since it provides "that no money hereby appropriated, or any unexpended balance of former appropriations for the erection of military telegraph lines, shall be expended upon any line that cannot be completed by such appropriations herein or already made." As I learn, the Chief Signal Officer and the Secretary of War both think that it would be impossible to tell in advance the exact amount that the lines in Texas may cost. Hence they say that this proviso would make the appropriation heretofore made, as well as the appropriation now made, nugatory, and the whole work is to be stopped, the material left upon the ground where it is now placed, and this work, which is considered by the Secretary of War of great importance for the military operations, is not to be completed at all. I ask that we concur in the amendment of the Senate striking out the proviso.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am always glad to oblige my friend from Texas, and I might do so in this case at once if I were not satisfied that there is some other way to accomplish what he wants and what the Committee on Appropriations want. The Committee on Appropriations think it necessary to limit the expenditures on these telegraphic lines. We gave a large appropriation last year, and materials were purchased and lines projected that could not be finished under the then existing legislation. All that we propose to do is to say that they shall not project work in advance of appropriations or beyond the amount of the appropriations. We think that reasonable; but if the gentleman thinks that non-concurrence in this amendment would block the work, I will not insist on it.

Mr. HANCOCK. The proviso was put in for that purpose, and the Secretary of War notified the Senate to-day that that would be the effect of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman himself believe that this would block the work?

Mr. HANCOCK. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion to non-concur in the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read the sixty-fourth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

To enable the Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, to construct a pneumatic tube between the Capitol and the Government Printing Office, $18,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the tubes used shall be purchased of the lowest and best bidder for the interest of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence on that amendment, as we have not heard enough about it to be able to judge whether it should be adopted or not.

The question was taken, and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now follow a number of amendments from numbers 67 to 80 inclusive, on pages 55 and 56, up to the second line of page 57, where the Senate has stricken out the provisions of the House for the payment of contestants and contestees in contested-election cases. The committee recommend non-concurrence in all of those amendments because the House put them in by a very decided majority.

Mr. HOLMAN. They all stand upon the same footing, and all are in defiance of the law of the last Congress. I therefore move that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate striking out these appropriations which were made in defiance of the policy of the last Congress, which was supposed at the time to be a great reform of a very great abuse.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to say a single word upon this subject. The House has expressed its opinion very emphatically that where contests are instituted in good faith and upon probable cause it is the policy of the House to pay actual disbursements. I do not suppose the House cares to review the decision it has made upon that question. I desire to say this: that under the Constitution the House is the sole judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members. And I think the attempt on the part of the Senate to prohibit payment by the House, or payment in accordance with a vote of the House, of the expenses of these contests is an impertinence which the House ought not to submit to. It is within our prerogative, and if we are the sole judges of the elections and returns of our members, then we are the proper judges of the evidence to be brought before us, and the compensation it is necessary for us to make to parties who have brought that evidence before us. I hope the House will non-concur in these amendments of the Senate.

The question was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and upon a division there were ayes 31, noes not counted.

So the amendments were not concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 162) explanatory of an act, entitled "An act to fix the number of paymasters in the Army," approved March 2, 1875.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The eighty-fifth amendment of the Senate was read, to strike out the following:

To provide for the payment, under existing laws, for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States, $50,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is, I suppose, to pay for horses lost by private soldiers during the late war. If so, then it would seem that an appropriation is necessary to provide for payment for such losses.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a permanent appropriation that will meet nearly all these claims. The Committee on Appropriations put in this provision in the first instance with a view of putting on the statute of limitations, of establishing a bar against these claims, so that they might not be presented after a certain time. That limitation was stricken off in the House, and the Senate has struck this out.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Claims have before them several cases—perhaps one hundred, or two hundred, or three hundred claims for the loss of this kind of property—private claims. We have for two or three years been endeavoring to provide by general law for the class of claims which we considered as meritorious, but have failed as yet to do so. There are some cases pending now; some have been allowed and some have not. The amount here proposed to be appropriated is small enough to meet those now allowed and which will be allowed in the next Congress. There is no provision for their payment. This class of claims should have been considered long ago. When a private soldier has lost his own horse in the service of the Government, and by some technicality under existing law is unable to recover the value of his property, it is a tax on the patriotism of the men who not only themselves served the country but who took their own horses with them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The very argument the gentleman makes defeats itself. He speaks of the claims in Congress. Now every such claim that passes Congress carries an appropriation with it; those that do not pass do not require any appropriation.

Mr. MAYNARD. The expression used by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that there is a general appropriation nearly large enough is suggestive that this should be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. A portion of the law has been repealed.

Mr. CONGER. Another thing: Some of these cases have been held back that might have been settled but for the difficulty of finding evidence. The evidence is now supplied, and there is no money to pay them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I quite agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that there should be legislation on this whole subject. I believe the old law of 1849, made with special view to losses in the Mexican war, and which is the only law we have on the subject, ought not to require us to pay out year by year for old claims for horses lost away back in the Mexican war. I think we ought not to appropriate any more money than is appropriated in the regular appropriation bill until this law is fixed.

Mr. CONGER. But there is no appropriation to pay the claims allowed in the Departments under the existing law to soldiers who have incurred losses of this kind. From my knowledge of the subject, I think there has been more neglect and less care exercised in Congress in providing for this class of claims than any other. This appropriation will meet a few of those cases. I hope the House will not concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McCRARY. I also hope that the House will non-concur. I happen to have knowledge of a number of these claims which are as yet unadjusted. They have been filed, and the proof perhaps in some instances is sufficient; but if they be allowed by the Department, there is no money to pay them without an appropriation of this kind.

The question being taken, the amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

Strike out lines 1544 to 1547, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to acquire a full and perfect title to the "Brady collection of photographs of the war," and to secure by purchase the remainder now in the possession of the artist, $25,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. We recommend non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate striking out this paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we shall concur.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope not; and I know my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would not so desire if he understood the case. The Secretary of War purchased from Mr. Brady, the photographer, a part of a gallery of photographs of all the scenes of the war and all the leading men in the war, a collection that must be very valuable hereafter in connection with the history of the war. The rest of this collection remained in Mr. Brady's hand. The title under which the Secretary of War purchased the part already obtained was acquired from forfeiture for non-payment of the storage. It is very doubtful whether the Secretary of War has a valid title. But that part of the collection has already been purchased; and now the object of this provision is to close up the whole thing and give the Government entire control of this collection, which would be worth at a commercial valuation more than $150,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. Then why does Mr. Brady sell it to the Government through this appropriation for $25,000?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think this is a sort of expenditure that this Government ought to make. Does any gentleman suppose that if the Government does not become the owner of this collection it is therefore lost to the country? Are we to assume that nothing which has connected with it anything of patriotic recollection must be a matter of private enterprise or private ownership? The truth is that for a Government in our condition, embarrassed financially, obliged to resort to heavy taxation to meet current expenses—for a Government in this position to make expenditures for any purpose not absolutely necessary seems to me entirely unwarranted and is in violation of the pledge made by one hundred and forty-nine members of this House, that during the present session no money should be appropriated except where imperatively required for the public service. I insist that there is no necessity for this expenditure; that it is not even warranted by good taste. To preserve and perpetuate the memories connected with the recent great struggle it is not necessary for us to take a collection of photographs here and there. Every city and town and village and hamlet in this country preserves and perpetuates whatever was valuable and glorious in the late struggle. It is not necessary that Congress should in this way burden still further the people of this country by oppressive taxation to do that which the people are taking care of themselves, and for the doing of which they will not thank us, when it involves additional taxation. I hope that an appropriation like this, even though it be only $25,000, will not be sustained by the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say but a word; I dislike to detain the House at all. Here is a man who has given twenty-five years of his life (and the life of any man, however humble his station may be, is worth something considerable) to one great purpose—to preserving national monuments so far as photographic art can do it, with a view of making such a collection as nowhere else exists in the world. I suppose that this is the only collection that contains original photographic plates and ambrotypes and even the earlier daguerreotype plates of our Presidents, beginning away back as early as Jackson and coming down to the present time, embracing all the great executive leaders of this country, all the military and naval heroes during that period, as well as all the scenes of great national importance. This man went so far as absolutely to send his organization into the field, and some of his men were wounded in going so near the battle-field to take pictures of the fight that was going on.

Now, when a man has followed up a purpose like this, and finally has fallen into misfortune and become broken down in his property, so that this vast collection which a few years ago it was said ought to be worth one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars had to be sold to pay for storage in a warehouse where it was kept, the Government of the United States becoming a buyer for $2,500 and getting three-fourths of the collection for that sum—under these circumstances, I submit, this great Government should not take advantage of a man's distress. I do not mean to say that the Secretary of War did wrong in purchasing this collection in the manner he did; he did right; he ought to have purchased it wherever he could purchase it cheapest. But this Government, this Congress, ought not to stand by and say "we will take advantage of this citizen in his distress." I think that this provision of the bill ought to be retained. It is just, it is a good purchase for the Government of the United States, and it is a great mercy to a suffering and worthy man.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

PAYMASTERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a joint resolution (H. R. No. 162) explanatory of an act entitled "An act fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States," approved March 2, 1875, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, in order that that amendment may be concurred in.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment concurred in.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to submit a conference report.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe I have a right to submit a conference report at any time.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not in order now as we are on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I believe it is order to submit a conference report at any time; that it is privileged.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us finish this bill first.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is important this voluminous bill should go to the clerks for engrossment at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. State what the bill is.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That has been enrolled, while this sundry civil appropriation bill has not been touched for enrollment. The legislative appropriation bill has been enrolled, excepting the single clause about which there has been disagreement between the two Houses. The moment it is passed it will go to a committee of conference, and then the gentleman can submit his report.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is not going to pass for hours.

Mr. GARFIELD. We are on the ninetieth amendment, and the rest will not give rise to any debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declines to entertain the report of the gentleman from Tennessee at this time.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The ninety-fifth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Strike out the word "members" and in lieu thereof insert "chairman;" so it will read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, Chief Engineer of the Army, and the chairman of the board of revision of taxes of the city and county of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move concurrence in that amendment, with an amendment striking out "the Chief Engineer of the Army." This relates to the sale of the navy-yard at Philadelphia and to the commission created by this bill for the purpose of making sale and conveyance of all the lands, docks, wharves, real property and appurtenances, rights, interests, and privileges of the United States included within the limits of, and known as the navy-yard in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania. We propose to strike out "the Chief Engineer of the Army," and with that to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to, and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 162) explanatory of an act entitled "An act fixing the number of paymasters in the Army of the United States," approved March 2, 1875;

An act (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department;

An act (H. R. No. 3884) granting a pension to Mary C. Toy;

An act (H. R. No. 3923) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the Joseph Warren Monument Association of Boston, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4858) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to sign the certificate of extension of letters-patent No. 28470, granted to Frederick T. Grant, May 29, 1860, upon a sliver machine.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The one hundred and first amendment of the Senate was as follows:

For continuation of building for custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. This amendment provides for an appropriation of $100,000 for continuing the building for custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Committee on Appropriations are distressed about the matter as to whether it shall be concurred in or non-concurred in. They are as tired over it as I am physically now. We have continued that building for over twenty years. We have voted at least eight times to complete it, sometimes to complete the building and then to complete the continuation. In that city many years ago there was a curious board called commissioners on settlement, not as might be supposed a commission for the settlement of the town, but it was a commission in reference to the settling of this custom-house building, to keep an account of how many feet the building settled, sunk into the ground at one end and the other from year to year. This committee on settling drew their salary with great regularity and the United States built on a few tiers of stone every time it sunk. A few years ago they changed the plan of it a little and enlarged it and our expensive friend Mullett went down and enlarged the plan still more and put on more stories. He had a fine marble cash-room constructed. Brother DAWES, when on the Committee on Appropriations, completed this building two or three times. I think Elihu B. Washburne finished it once or twice and I know the venerable Thad. Stevens since I have been here completed it several times. I think my committee completed it twice. Yet the Senate now proposes we shall continue it and make an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose. Whether we ought to do it or not is the question. It strikes me that we ought to non-concur.

Mr. SHELDON. The gentleman from Ohio mistook his calling. He would have made a splendid novel writer. There never was a single appropriation to complete this building. During the war there was no appropriation for the purpose of continuing it. There was no appropriation before the war to complete it; and I challenge the gentleman to produce any authority for his statements.

As to having a committee on settlement down there, it is utterly absurd. There never was such a committee. The building settled evenly if it settled at all, and I believe it did a little.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, if there has been any mistake as to the amount required to complete this building, it has not been the fault of the people of that State or their representatives upon this floor, but of the Supervising Architect.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The engineer board had it in charge before the war.

Mr. SHELDON. Mullett has not put on any additional stories. He is cutting down the building. He has changed it, not to make it larger, but smaller, and I assert what I know to be the fact, that no man to-day can enter the United States circuit court without danger of breaking his leg. I can appeal to my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and every member of the committee who went into the court-room at any time, and especially after dinner.

The fact is it is not in a proper condition to do the public business, and there ought to be this appropriation to complete it. I do not know why the Committee on Appropriations has taken such a prejudice, unless it be that there is a general prejudice against the whole affairs of Louisiana. But now since we have had two committees go down there, and they have both come back, and through their exertions the people have got together, I think there should be forgiveness and peace. So far as I am concerned, I will not ask another appropriation for that building or for any other purpose if this one is granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I guess we may agree to give this.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendments of the Senate numbered 102 and 103 are the same, applying in one case to the building at Chicago and in the other to the building in Cincinnati. These amendments strike out the following limitation put in by the House:

Provided, That the cost of said building, when completed, shall not exceed the limitation now fixed by law, $3,500,000, exclusive of cost of site; and the Architect of the Treasury shall prosecute the work upon said building upon such plans and specifications as that the same, when fully completed, shall not exceed said limitation.

We recommend non-concurrence. Perhaps the clause as it stands is not altogether wise. If not, we shall try to fix upon some one that is.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to one feature of this. I see no objection to the limitation being retained here as found in the law providing for the construction of these buildings. But I do not understand at all a clause which provides that—

The Architect of the Treasury shall prosecute the work upon said building upon such plans and specifications as that the same, when fully completed, shall not exceed said limitation.

All our public buildings at Philadelphia, Chicago, and Cincinnati have been constructed on plans submitted by the Supervising Architect to other officers of the Government. And if this means that the new Supervising Architect shall have absolute control of the plans of public buildings, I do not think this wise legislation at all. And I suggest to the chairman of the committee that at least that clause should be stricken out. I see no objection to limiting the expenditures on these buildings to the amount originally fixed. I hope the matter will be arranged in the way I have suggested.

Mr. GARFIELD. We can non-concur, and I will bear in mind the suggestion the gentleman has made

I desire here to say that in my speech on the sundry civil appropriation bill, February 25, I quoted seven paragraphs from an editorial in the New York Tribune of January 21 in reference to expenditures, appropriations, and unexpended balances under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department. Before doing so I sent the Tribune article to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and asked specific official information on the subject. In order to exhibit the full scope of the Tribune criticism, I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the seven paragraphs in full and collated from the official letter and table of the Treasury Department seven paragraphs, each intended to be a full and fair response to the Tribune article seriatim.

The Tribune rejoins in its issue of February 27, asserting that in my response I made no less than four distinct misrepresentations of its position, namely:

First. In my reply to the second paragraph of the Tribune article, I called attention to the fact that the Tribune represented that the $14,774,573 available July 1, 1873, was the unexpended balance of prior years, and showed from the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that only about six and a quarter millions of this sum were in fact balances of former years. I therefore held that the paragraph exaggerated the amount of such balances to the extent of eight and a half millions.

The Tribune confounds this reply with the statement in its third paragraph, that had no reference to the balances of July 1, 1873, nor to the appropriations for 1874, (the two together made the $14,774,573,) with the appropriations for 1875, which was the only subject in its third paragraph. I cannot see that in this I have misrepresented the paragraph, for the Tribune statement was erroneous and misleading.

Second. The Tribune alleges that I misrepresented the statement in its fifth paragraph by representing it as asserting that the balances of July 1, 1873, and the appropriations for 1874, together amounted to $23,131,098. I find, on a re-examination of that paragraph and my reply to it, that I mistook the meaning of the editor, and did unintentionally misrepresent him, and I take pleasure in saying so.

I was misled by the Tribune's language, which was that "the balances of July 1, 1873, being added to the $8,356,525 of fresh appropriations made in 1874, give an aggregate of $23,131,098." The words "appropriations made in 1874" led me to suppose that the editor referred to the appropriations for 1874, and his aggregate of $23,131,098 seemed to be the sum of the balances for 1873 and the appropiations of 1874. But this aggregate is in fact the old balances of 1873 plus the appropriations for the two fiscal years 1874 and 1875.

Third. The Tribune says:

> In one paragraph of his speech (Mr. GARFIELD's) he makes us give the appropriation for 1875 at $8,350,000, and in another place he makes us give it at $12,340,000. We have never stated them at the latter amount.

That I did not misrepresent the Tribune may be seen from the first portion of the Tribune's sixth paragraph in the article of January 21, which is as follows:

> From the above summary it appears that although the appropriations made for public buildings were $12,341,944 for the year ending June 30, 1874, &c.

Here is a declaration of the Tribune, to which I responded by saying that that was not the sum appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1874.

I do not see how the Tribune can say that it has never stated them at the latter amount.

Fourth. The Tribune alleges that I have misrepresented its article when I say that the balance standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect January 20, 1875, was $5,803,089.80, and not $15,000,000, as stated by the Tribune. On this the editor says:

> We have said nothing about the balance standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect on January 20, 1875. The $15,000,000 balance was stated to have existed June 30, 1874.

In answer, I call attention to the seventh paragraph in the Tribune's article of January 20, beginning with these words:

> The vast sum, $15,000,000, which the Supervising Architect is authorized to expend, &c.

This appeared to me to imply that that much was now available, and the official table shows that on the 20th of January, the day previous to the publication of the Tribune articles, the balance standing to the credit of the Supervising Architect was $5,803,089.80. I give this latter sum as the Treasurer's response to what I supposed the Tribune meant in its seventh paragraph. If that was not the Tribune's meaning, its language was unfortunate.

And now comes a second article in the Tribune, of March 1, containing three paragraphs on this subject. The first attacks the correctness of the letter and table of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Whatever may be the merits of that controversy, it has no bearing upon my fairness in the case. I however call attention to this feature of that paragraph: It is insisted that the Secretary of the Treasury in his letter to me does not include, among other things, buildings and grounds of the Naval Academy; repairs, fuel, refurnishing and lighting the Executive Mansion; improvements of building of Government Hospital for the Insane; but none of which things are now, and never were, under the control of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, whose expenditures alone were in controversy.

In the second paragraph the Tribune of March 1, refers to the expenditures for arsenals; and asks whether General GARFIELD considers the structures at these arsenals "public buildings." Certainly they are public buildings; they are part of the public works constructed and maintained by the War Department, as really as are the harbors under the same Department; as really as are the light-houses under the Light-House Board. But they do not relate to the controversy in hand, namely, the expenditures for public buildings under the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Third, the Tribune refers to a paragraph in the annual report of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury of 1873. If there is a discrepancy between that report and the official table furnished me by the Treasury Department, I am not aware of it. I have not had time to examine the alleged discrepancy and do not now make any assertion in regard to it. I am only concerned with the question of the fairness of my statements in criticising the Tribune article. Wherein I have misrepresented, I have frankly acknowledged it; and in doing this I have not wandered from the topic under discussion; nor have I said anything which merits the closing suggestion of the Tribune article, that I am now less willing to believe in the truth than at any other period of my life.

The records of this House will show how earnestly, and not altogether in vain, I have striven to reduce the expenditures of the Government generally, and particularly extravagant expenditures on public buildings. That they have been extravagant and that they are already too great, I have been foremost to declare; and in this I have needed and desired the support of public opinion. Instead of that it is quite the fashion to blame me with the extravagances I have tried to prevent rather than to give me the fair credit I have deserved in so far as my resistance has been successful. I hardly think it will be generally denied that there was a time when the Tribune was more willing than it now is to see worthiness in the efforts of those who are faithfully striving to curb and limit the extravagance of the Government.

The question being taken on the Senate amendments numbered 102 and 103, they were not concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. We ask non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 106 and 107, which propose to strike out the limitations in reference to the public buildings at Philadelphia and Raleigh.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

The one hundred and eighth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

> After line 1831, insert the following:
> For completion of building for custom-house and post-office at Trenton, New Jersey, $100,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment numbered 108 appropriates for the completion of the building for the custom-house and post-office at Trenton, New Jersey; and the amendment numbered 109 appropriates for the building at Grand Rapids, Michigan.

The committee recommend non-concurrence in those two. When I state the reason, I think gentlemen will agree that it is sufficient. For Trenton the whole amount provided by the original act has been appropriated. The Senate proposes to go beyond that $100,000. The building at Grand Rapids, Michigan, is in the same condition, and the amendment proposes an additional appropriation of $50,000. We propose non-concurrence, believing that in conference we may adjust the matter, and if we do not give the whole we may give a part.

Mr. DOBBINS. I should regret exceedingly if this amendment of the Senate, appropriating $100,000 for the completion of the building for a custom-house and post-office at Trenton, should not be concurred in. The building is up to the second story, and is now in such a condition that it must be a serious disadvantage not to go forward with the work of completing it. The plan of the building has been decided upon; the foundation has been laid; and, as I have stated, the building is now up to the second story. It would be most unfortunate indeed if it should have to be left open another winter exposed to the weather. The probability is that this appropriation will very nearly or quite finish the building. It will certainly inclose it.

Trenton City is the capital of the State, and the number of inhabitants is between thirty and forty thousand. The entire southern part of the State, as is known, is bounded by the ocean; and on this account there is necessarily a great deal of business done by the United States courts there. The building is intended partly for the accommodation of the courts. With the city of Philadelphia on one side and the city of New York on the other there is great risk of smuggling, and it is a very important matter that the building for the accommodation of the courts as well as for the custom-house and post-offices be completed. I am informed by the postmaster that Trenton pays into the Treasury through the post-office something over $20,000 a year. It occurs to me therefore, as a practical man, that it would be a very serious disadvantage not to have this appropriation made. It is sufficient to inclose the building, and as I understand nearly sufficient, if not quite, to entirely finish it.

I hope the House will concur in the Senate amendments.

The question being taken on concurring in the Senate amendment, there were ayes 28, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not concurred in.

The one hundred and ninth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

> After line 1836 insert the following:
> For continuation of building for custom-house and post-office at Grand Rapids, Michigan, $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a little pious fraud in the language used here, "continuation of building." My friend from Michigan [Mr. WILLIAMS] is aware that there has not been even a plan made; the first thing has not been done. There has been nothing except the purchase of a site. Let us not depart from the truth by enacting into solemn law the declaration that we are to appropriate for continuing a building that we have not begun.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I do not desire to apologize for any departure from the truth which there may be in the language of the Senate amendment. I do think, however, that this is properly a continuation of an appropriation for this public building. An appropriation was made last year of $70,000 for a building at Grand Rapids. The site has been purchased, and this is to continue the work already commenced by the General Government. I do not see that there would be any piety in refusing the appropriation.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendments numbered 111, 112, 113, and 114 cut down the appropriations for furniture and repairs, for carpets, for fuel, light, and water, for heating-apparatus, for vault, safes, and locks, &c., for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department. The Committee on Appropriations do not believe that this reduction can be made without making it necessary to bring in a deficiency. We desire the House to non-concur in those amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Those five items, all of them being of the same general character, for furniture, fuel, heating-apparatus, vaults, safes, &c., for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, amount to the very large sum of $800,000. We have been making enormous appropriations for these purposes of late years, and it seems to me that the reductions proposed to be made by the Senate are not unreasonable. Our extravagance in these matters has been too manifest. It has been the subject of very grave and serious comment all over the country, and especially where these public buildings are located The Senate proposes to reduce the aggregate amount to the extent of $175,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman from Indiana says that these items sum up $800,000. The actual figures give only $225,000. You may freeze to death in the winter by cutting this off.

Mr. HOLMAN. I repeat that the various paragraphs under this head, appropriating for furniture, lights, heating-apparatus, &c., for these public buildings, sum up $800,000. If the gentleman will add the figures together he will ascertain what is the fact.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] is generally very correct, but he is mistaken this time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is undoubtedly correct in his figures.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Senate proposes to reduce this sum $175,000. The sentiment is very prevalent that we are extravagant in our appropriations, and I hope the amendment made by the Senate will be concurred in. Six hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is a sum quite large enough for those purposes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say only one word more. I have two or three times, at the close of a session, been told by friends on the other side that my economy was a thing of an hour, only intended to affect an election, and that what we reduced one year would be brought up the next time in the shape of a deficiency. Now, I will say to the gentleman plainly that these matters of fuel and light and heating-apparatus, &c., most of the matters in these items are things we cannot control. They have got to have about so much. There are one hundred and thirty-five buildings over which the Treasury Department has control; and for heating and lighting and furnishing and putting in vaults and safes and locks, &c., for all of these one hundred and thirty-five buildings $800,000 is not perhaps too large a sum. And from the experience I have had in the last few years I am fully persuaded that if this appropriation is cut down the gentlemen who will have charge of these subjects next winter will have to pass a deficiency bill or else suffer the whole of our buildings to remain cold and dark during the winter. And what would be the result? It would be said that this had been done because this republican House wanted to get up a show of economy and had left the next House to supply their deficiencies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I pledge my friend from Ohio my word that that statement shall not come from me. I am confident that the amount proposed to be voted by the Senate is large enough. I know that we have encouraged extravagance of expenditures for the buildings under the control of the Treasury by our lavish appropriations of public money. We have made large appropriations for furniture not at all required. I insist that we can afford to run the risk of a deficiency on an item like this.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will compromise with the gentleman by agreeing with the amendment in relation to furniture.

Many MEMBERS. O, no!

Mr. GARFIELD. All right; then I ask the House to non-concur in all the amendments.

The question was taken upon concurring in the series of amendments, and there were 20 in the affirmative.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I will not call for a further count if the reduction by $50,000 of the appropriation for furniture be agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let it be so.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say that the amendment of the Senate No. 116 relates to what is known as the Kellogg bill for the reorganization of the Treasury Department, which was attached by the House to this bill. The Senate have stricken out that portion of the bill, and the Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will concur in the amendment of the Senate so far as it relates to the general increase of salaries in the Treasury Department. I presume the ground of objection on the part of the Senate to this portion of the bill was not so much that there was some reduction in the number of employés as that there was a general increase of salaries of the higher officers in the Treasury Department. I suppose that was the motive of the Senate in striking out this portion of the bill. It seems to me that a general increase of salaries is scarcely warrantable on an appropriation bill. The offices of the Treasury, the auditorships and others, have been filled by persons whose duties have been well performed. I trust the House will concur in striking out all this increase of salaries.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we may have a vote; it is getting very late.

The amendment of the Senate was not concurred in upon a division—ayes 12, noes not counted.

The one hundred and nineteenth amendment of the Senate was to reduce from two months to one month the extra pay to clerks and employés discharged from Executive Departments in Washington on account of reductions of force made necessary by legislation of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope not. These men who are turned out in consequence of our legislation, and from no fault of their own, ought to have something to enable them to get home.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The remaining amendments of the Senate were disposed of as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that a committee of conference be requested of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

CIRCUIT COURT IN NEVADA.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed Senate bill No. 1282. It simply changes the place of holding the United States circuit court in Nevada from Carson City to Virginia City.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

OVERCHARGE OF DUTIES ON TONNAGE AND IMPORTS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Ways and Means House bill No. 3828, to provide judicial remedies for overcharge of duties on tonnage and imports. The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill in the first place, and it was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee have instructed me to report the bill back with a recommendation that it pass, with an amendment providing that nothing in the bill shall be construed to change existing laws in regard to the appraisement of goods. That amendment obviates the objection to the bill. I ask that the bill as amended be now passed.

No objection was made, and the bill was amended and passed.

WILLIAM N. DENNY.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask unanimous consent that the House now consider and pass Senate bill No. 560, for the relief of William N. Denny, major of the Fifty-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The bill directs the Paymaster-General of the United States Army to pay to William N. Denny, late major of the Fifty-first Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, the pay and emoluments of a major of infantry from June 30, 1863, the date his commission was received at headquarters of the command to which he belonged, to May 15, 1865, the date of his muster in as lieutenant-colonel, as if he had been mustered in as major on the date of the receipt of his commission, first deducting whatever sum may have been paid him as captain during the period for which he is hereby allowed as major.

No objection was made, and the bill was passed.

PONTON BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask unanimous consent for the House now to take up and pass Senate bill No. 1230, to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa. This bill has been considered by the Committee on Commerce and is unanimously recommended by them.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and passed at this time Senate bill No. 1349, amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company. It has passed the Senate unanimously, and forty-two thousand depositors are depending upon our action on this bill to obtain their money, or a portion of it, from this company. I ask that it be taken up and passed for the benefit of these colored people.

Objection was made.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 28) to set apart a certain portion of the island of Mackinac, in the Straits of Mackinac, within the State of Michigan, as a national park;

An act (S. No. 378) granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States;

An act (S. No. 524) to protect ornamental and other trees on Government reservations and on lands purchased by the United States, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 608) granting the right of way through the public lands to construct and maintain a railroad;

An act (S. No. 671) for the relief of Alexander Minor, of West Virginia;

An act (S. No. 710) for the relief of E. Laws, chief engineer, United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 807) for the relief of Washington Crosland;

An act (S. No. 867) to correct a clerical error in the act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, approved June 8, 1872;

An act (S. No. 878) for the relief of Rosa Vertner Jeffreys;

An act (S. No. 898) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Passed Assistant Paymaster E. Mellach, United States Navy; and

An act (S. No. 912) to annex certain lands to reservation No. 2, occupied by the Department of Agriculture.

HON. JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a personal explanation. Some time ago a stormy scene occurred in this House during an exciting session upon a very exciting subject. In that connection I ask the Clerk to read a letter which I have placed in his hands.

The Clerk read as follows:

810 TWELFTH STREET,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1875.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I beg again to express my regret that my severe and long-continued illness has prevented my taking any part in rectifying by the action of the House the injustice which I am fully convinced was done your friend, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, by the resolution of censure moved by myself.

In my conversation with you on the last day I was in my seat, some weeks ago, I expressed my conviction that so far as that resolution imputed to Mr. BROWN any intention of prevarication or double dealing in his response to the Speaker, I was satisfied, on a review of the record itself and in view of my own distinct recollection of the language uttered by Mr. BROWN, that I, in common with the majority of the House, had been misled and had done injustice to Mr. BROWN.

The record itself I know to be incorrect in making his language preceding his allusion to the case of Burke a direct charge upon a person not then named, when in fact it was stated as a hypothetical case. I was watching with intense care every word that Mr. BROWN uttered, and know that it was put hypothetically, and not as a direct charge.

His response to the interrogatory of the Speaker, followed by his subsequent application of his remarks to Mr. BUTLER, impressed me at the time as a prevarication and an unfair response, which enabled him to finish his sentence which would otherwise have been stopped by the Speaker.

But a careful examination of the record since, qualifying it by my own distinct recollection, satisfies me that I did a great wrong to Mr. BROWN in imputing this intent to him, and that there was nothing in his response to the Speaker inconsistent with entire good faith or with the integrity of an upright and honorable man.

I regret that I could not have stated this conviction of mine upon the floor of the House, and have thus aided in wiping out the undeserved imputation upon Mr. BROWN in this regard inflicted by my resolution; but my continued illness has kept me from my seat now for nearly four weeks, and will prevent my taking it again during the session.

I am glad to have the opportunity of expressing myself thus freely and unreservedly to you, especially in view of the opinion I have always entertained of Mr. BROWN as a gentleman of the most perfect integrity and honor, though doubtless sometimes excitable and impulsive, as I think he was on the occasion in question.

I shall never hesitate to express freely the conviction I have above expressed to you, and if anything contained in this letter will, in your judgment, be of service to Mr. BROWN, I beg you to consider the letter entirely at your service for any use whatever which you or other friends of Mr. BROWN may think proper to make of it.

With sentiments of the highest regard for yourself, I am, very truly, your obedient servant,

ROB: S. HALE.

Hon. T. T. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are about to part; and it is better that we should not leave behind us any relic of ill-feeling. If I should receive any encouragement from the other side, I would desire to make a motion, a proposition (it would better come from the other side) to relieve the record of that portion of the censure which charges the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] with "prevarication."

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope, if the gentleman makes such a proposition, he will not base his application upon that trashy letter. If he will appeal to our sympathies——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to send a paper to the desk and have it read for the action of the House.

Mr. NEGLEY. If my colleague appeals to our feelings or sympathies——

Mr. RANDALL. I have no appeal to make, except what I say for myself upon this floor.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution sent to the desk by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay to the several clerks to committees of the House who are paid during the session only a sum equal to two months' salary from the 4th instant; the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. SPEER. O, withdraw that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended to pass this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is adopted.

Mr. SPEER. To obtrude such a matter at this time is unworthy of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

HON. JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Mr. NEGLEY. I did not rise to make any objection to the request of my colleague—not in the slightest degree. But if it was the intention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to acknowledge that he inflicted upon the member from Kentucky a wrong——

Mr. RANDALL. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NEGLEY. He certainly has inflicted upon this House a very singular communication.

Mr. DAWES. I observe, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Kentucky is himself in the Hall; and he can at once put the House in such a position that it will be most glad to wipe out anything that reflects upon his honor.

Mr. TODD. I desire in connection with this question to call the attention of the House to the fact that when the censure was about being pronounced upon the gentleman from Kentucky he was asked whether he had any explanation to make to the House of the language he had used. He declined to make any explanation, and said that he stood by the words he had uttered.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the subject from the consideration of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to add——

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the subject from the consideration of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor, I believe, and I would like to add——

Mr. BARRY. Has not the subject been withdrawn?

Mr. DAWES. So far as I am personally concerned——

Mr. BARRY. If the subject has been withdrawn I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has withdrawn the matter.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to add that, so far as I have had personally any connection with this matter, nothing would delight me more, as I am about to leave this House, than to contribute to the wiping out of whatever there is in that resolution that is painful to the gentleman from Kentucky; and I wish to state to the House that I have endeavored heretofore, and before the attention of the House was called to it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to find some possible ground upon which I could ask the House to do it.

If I have failed to find that ground, sir, it has not been for want of earnest, honest effort on my part. I look upon it as an opportunity for the gentleman from Kentucky to put himself before this country in a light in which every gentleman would like to have himself put. And I call upon his friends here in this House to do courteously what he is unwilling to do himself.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to remind the House that on yesterday we rescinded upon our record the resolution censuring General CAMERON; and the House to-day in a spirit of truth passed a resolution of thanks in the most exalted terms to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and I did hope, having done all this yesterday and to-day, I would be met in a better spirit than has been manifested on this occasion. Magnanimity seeems to be all on our side.

Mr. DAWES. I will be the first to move to wipe out that whole resolution if the gentleman from Kentucky will present himself to this House in the manner in which the public judgment asks him to present himself.

Mr. CLYMER. As far as the judgment of the public is concerned as to what the gentleman from Kentucky said on the occasion referred to, it is that he was right. It was true, even if it was unparliamentary.

Mr. DURHAM. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. TODD. I ask the House to hear me a moment.

Mr. DURHAM. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TODD. I only wish to say——

Mr. DURHAM. I object to his saying a word.

Mr. TODD. I ask to make a statement.

Mr. DURHAM. Well, I have no objection to the gentleman himself, but I call for the regular order of business and do object to this matter proceeding further.

Mr. TODD. Have I not a right to make a statement?

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Kentucky has a right to object.

Mr. DURHAM. And I do object, and insist on my objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution to be referred to the Committee on Printing that the obituary addresses in regard to the deceased members of this House, made some days ago, be printed.

Mr. DURHAM. I object to anything out of the regular order of business.

ALLEGHENY VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 996) for the relief of the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company the sum of $7,232.75, a balance due to said company, as per account balanced upon the books of the Post-Office Department, for transportation of the mails in the years 1868 and 1869, which cannot be paid until an appropriation is made therefor, the balances of the appropriations for those years having been covered into the Treasury under the provisions of the act of July 12, 1870.

Mr. HOLMAN. This seems to be out of the regular order of proceedings on the part of the Post-Office Department and ought to be considered by some proper committee before it is taken up in this House for action. I therefore object to the bill.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. SPEER. We have five minutes' debate on this bill I believe. The bill itself is right, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsyvania [Mr. NEGLEY] will say a word in explanation of it.

Mr. NEGLEY. This is merely in settlement of the balance due that company which the company failed to draw from the Treasury in time. The unexpended balances were covered into the Treasury. It is a debt due on the part of the Government in favor of this company and ought to be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why was it not paid in the current fiscal year?

Mr. NEGLEY. The accounts of the company were not settled at the time the unexpended balances were covered into the Treasury, and that is the only reason why it was not paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is clear to my mind, Mr. Speaker, that this is not any matter concerning the regular transportation of the mails, for if it had been it would have been paid for quarterly under the laws regulating our mail transportation.

Mr. SPEER. In 1870 or 1872 a law was passed requiring all of the unexpended balances to be covered into the Treasury, and before that law was passed the accounts were not settled quarterly.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there can be furnished any official information in reference to this matter I should like to see it.

Mr. SPEER. The Senator from my State, who lives in the same town with myself, Senator SCOTT, considered the case carefully and reported this bill to the Senate, and on his recommendation it was passed and sent to this House. I believe it to be a sum honestly due to this company, and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is likely that this money is due to this company, but there is no official evidence of the fact before the House. In all these cases we ought to have some facts before the House before we are called upon to act upon any such measure.

Mr. SPEER. The report of the Senate committee will show it ought to be passed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 25.

So the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

JAMES JACKSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S No. 755) to relieve James Jackson, of Georgia, of his political disabilities.

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to anything but the regular order. I am willing, however, that the resolution shall be read.

The resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That ten thousand copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the death of the late members of this House, Messrs. Hooper, Hersey, Crocker, and Rice, be printed in the usual form; seven thousand of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and three thousand for the use of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the river and harbor appropriation bill with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the river and harbor appropriation bill were non-concurred in, and a committee of conference asked upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] to take from the Speaker's table the bill amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company?

Many members objected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed to take up that bill; it is a very important bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I must insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the House to rescind the order under which it is acting by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that it be rescinded for the consideration of the bill of which the gentleman from Kentucky has charge.

The SPEAKER. That could not be done, but of course the order can be set aside by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MERRIAM. I hope it will be rescinded.

Mr. DURHAM. I am not asking to take up this bill out of the regular order. If the House will go on with the regular order of business it will soon be reached.

COLORADO TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 909) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There can be no objection to that bill.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

FRANCIS M. STRONG AND THOMAS ROSS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1094) for the relief of Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross.

The bill, which was read, provides that Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross, of the State of Vermont, shall have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of patent for an improvement in weighing-scales of the date of the 24th of May, 1859, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which the patent was granted, such application to be made in the same manner and have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the original patent, and upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law and the original term of the patent had not expired.

The bill provides further, that no persons shall be held liable for infringements of said patent if extended, or making use of the invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent prior to the date of its extension.

Mr. SMART. I desire to state that this case was considered by the Committee on Patents of the House and that I was authorized to make a favorable report upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must object to the bill. I am not sitting up here to extend patents. I do not think that we should extend patents this time of day.

Mr. SMART. I can state in a moment all there is in this case. These gentlemen were entitled to an extension under the old law, but failed to get it through owing to an error of a clerk in the Patent Office. They supposed that their application had been filed and they afterward discovered that it was not.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I doubt very much whether any member of the Committee on Patents knows what this patent is for. There was no proof showing what it was for, except that it was for an improvement in scales. It has been the rule of the Committee on Patents that before granting an extension of a patent there should be some showing of what the patent has paid before the patentee goes before the Commissioner for an extension. In this case there is not the smallest scintilla of evidence showing how much these parties have made. So far as the House is informed, they may have made $50,000 or $100,000, and they may not have made a dollar, or they may have lost $10,000. There was no evidence to show as to how much the patentees have realized out of this invention in the fourteen years, so that there is here a fatal defect to my mind.

Sir, these parties are not in default on this occasion for the first time. In 1870 they were before Congress asking relief for another default. It occurs to me that after their default four or five years ago they should have shown more promptness and carefulness on this occasion; or if not that, they ought to have disclosed to the House and country upon what sort of grounds they predicated their present application. I take it that it should be shown that they have not received sufficient remuneration from their patent during the fourteen years during which it has existed, and in reference to that there is not a word of proof.

Mr. CONGER. The House, I presume, will not doubt that the Committee on Patents have been very careful in their recommendations to the House, so much so that I think one proposition to extend a patent or not—more than one—has been presented to the House this session. The committee have examined a bill similar to the one now on the Speaker's table, and we found that but for the fault or neglect of an officer in the Patent Office this extension would have been granted on regular application under the law. A misunderstanding arose from the fault and neglect on the part of one of the officers of the Government, and the committee thought that these parties should not be deprived of the right they had under the old law on account of that neglect or fault on the part of one of the officers of the Patent Office, and therefore they have prepared a report recommending this bill when reached upon the Speaker's table, adding their recommendation to the action of the Senate. This is a patent for an improvement in platform-scales, and so far as the committee had any information they did not find out that the public ever paid much or the parties received much.

But, independent of that, the parties had a right to an extension of their patent under the law except for the neglect to which I have alluded, and therefore the committee say that it is but just that they should have the right to go before the Commissioner with the same rights which they would have had but for the fault of an officer of the Government.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. If the attorney of these parties failed in his duty they have a remedy against him in damages.

Mr. MOREY. There can be no doubt that this is a very "scaly" case.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill, and on a division there were ayes 23, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was rejected.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I rise to a privileged report. I submit a report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes on the bill (H. R. No. 3341) a bill to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses—

That the House recede from its vote non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

LEWIS B. GUNCKEL,
JOHN COBURN,
CHARLES A. ELDREDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
H. HAMLIN,
GEORGE E. SPENCER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I will state that when I first returned to the floor of the House it was said that there would be a recess until eight o'clock, and I then said to my colleague on the committee from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that I would not call the report up until that time. He and other gentlemen interested in this question have left the Hall, and I do not want to take any advantage of their absence.

The SPEAKER. The report is highly privileged, and the gentleman can withhold it until that time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has a message been received from the Senate in regard to the appointment of a conference committee upon the sundry civil bill?

The SPEAKER. Not yet.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was going to say that if it had we might take a recess for a time.

WASHINGTON AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back with the recommendation that it do pass the bill (S. No. 1098) to aid the Washington and Ohio Railroad Company in the construction of their road to the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NAVY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 706) to amend section 1422 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the better government of the Navy.

The bill provides that the seventeenth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, shall be so amended as to read as follows:

SEC. 17. That it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of any fleet, squadron, or vessel acting singly, when on service, to send to an Atlantic or to a Pacific port of the United States, as their enlistment may have occurred on either the Atlantic or Pacific coast of the United States, in some public or other vessel, all petty officers and persons of inferior ratings desiring to go there at the expiration of their terms of enlistment, or as soon thereafter as may be, unless, in his opinion, the detention of such persons for a longer period should be essential to the public interests, in which case he may detain them, or any of them, until the vessel to which they belong shall return to such Atlantic or Pacific port. All persons enlisted without the limits of the United States may be discharged, on the expiration of their enlistment, either in a foreign port or in a port of the United States, or they may be detained as above provided beyond the term of their enlistment; and that all persons sent home, or detained by a commanding officer, according to the provisions of this act, shall be subject in all respects to the laws and regulations for the government of the Navy until their return to an Atlantic or Pacific port and their regular discharge, and all persons so detained by such officer, or re-entering to serve until the return to an Atlantic or Pacific port of the vessel to which they belong, shall in no case be held in service more than thirty days after their arrival in said port; and that all persons who shall be so detained beyond their terms of enlistment, or who shall, after the termination of their enlistment, voluntarily re-enter to serve until the return to an Atlantic or Pacific port of the vessel to which they belong, and their regular discharge therefrom, shall receive for the time during which they are so detained, or shall so serve beyond their original terms of enlistment, an addition of one-fourth of their former pay: Provided, That the shipping articles shall hereafter contain the substance of this section.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

SURVIVORS OF THE POLARIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 843) for the relief of the survivors of the Polaris.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the survivors of the Polaris engaged in the Arctic exploration under command of Captain Charles F. Hall, their widows or minor children, and in the order named, a sum of money in addition to that already paid equal in amount to one year's pay which each would have been entitled to respectively if continued in the service, under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for said exploring expedition; and that Mercy Ann Hall, widow of Captain Hall, be paid a sum equal in amount to two years' pay which her husband would have received if living and continued in the service as before provided; and that the sum of $360 each be paid to Joe Eberbing and Hans Hendrick, Esquimaux, who rendered valuable assistance to that part of the ship's crew rescued from the ice-floe on or about the 30th day of April, 1873; said payment to be made direct to each individual claimant upon satisfactory evidence of his identity; provided, that if any sale, assignment, or transfer shall be made of any interest in the gratuity provided by this act, the amount so assigned shall revert to the Government of the United States.

Mr. ARCHER. That bill is recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not desire to oppose this bill, but I wish to say this: instead of giving to Eberbing, the Esquimaux, the sum of $360 for services of great value, he certainly ought to be paid as much as any one named in the bill. He was indeed the party who saved those who were on the ice. There are many petitions from geographical societies and eminent men in the country asking that Congress recognize his services. But it is now impossible to amend this bill without defeating it on account of the lateness of the session. Hereafter I have no doubt Congress will do justice to Eberbing.

Mr. ARCHER. If this bill should now be amended it will be lost between the two Houses.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let us give him what we can by this bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. So far as he himself is concerned he would prefer to be left out of the bill entirely, rather than have merely $360 given to him. Every one who has examined the subject says that he should receive the highest sum named in the bill. He has been of great service and has made great sacrifices and is more entitled to compensation than any man named in the bill, and he is turned off with a mere pittance. That is not the fault of the committee of this House, for the bill came from the Senate. The committee of this House do not recommend any amendment to the bill because it might lead to its being lost between the two Houses. But I have been requested by Eberbing to say that he preferred being left out of the bill.

Mr. ARCHER. If the bill should be amended and thereby lost, it would work injustice to others who were exposed for months on the ice.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not wish to do that.

Mr. ARCHER. This can be rectified in the next Congress if any wrong is done.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Nothing prevents my moving an amendment except that the bill would thereby be lost, and deserving men would not receive what it is proposed to give them.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The rules were suspended; and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

WAGON-ROAD IN UTAH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1166) granting the right of way over the public lands for the construction of a wagon-road in Salt Lake County, Utah Territory.

Mr. PAGE. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not necessary; the bill can be laid aside.

The bill was returned to the Speaker's table.

GEORGE W. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1147) for the relief of Courtland Parker as administrator of George W. Anderson, deceased.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Courtland Parker, as administrator of George W. Anderson, the sum of $13,254.67, being the amount received into the Treasury of the United States, under certain proceedings and decree in the southern district of New York, undertaken to condemn the stock and dividends of said Anderson in the Minnesota Mining Company, the Rockland Mining Company, the Superior Mining Company, and the Steel River Mining Company, the same being in full for all claims and demands of said Parker as administrator, or the heirs or representatives of said estate, against the United States, connected with or in any manner growing out of said claim, for which a receipt shall be taken in full by the proper officer of the Treasury.

Mr. POTTER. That bill, if I understand the case, should pass. I will be glad to explain it if any explanation is needed.

Mr. MERRIAM. We will take your statement that it is right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again read, or some explanation be made of it.

Mr. POTTER. I would be willing to explain the bill if anybody wishes to hear it explained.

Many MEMBERS. Vote; vote.

The question was taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 35, noes 15.

Mr. HOLMAN. No person seems to know anything about this bill, and I must insist upon a quorum to pass it.

Mr. POTTER. Allow me to state what the facts are. This man Anderson was a loyal citizen of Savannah. During the war he was absent in the city of New York. Certain shares of mining stock were there held in his name. One Mudgett, an informer and spy, applied for the condemnation of the property on the ground that Anderson was disloyal. It appears that the proceeding was wholly irregular and erroneous; but the court condemned the property, awarding to Mudgett his half as informer, while the other half, about $10,000, was paid into the Treasury of the United States. After the war was over Anderson returned. He brought suit against Mudgett, showed that the allegations that had been made against him were absolutely false, and recovered from Mudgett his share of the property. If the United States had been su ble he would have recovered from the United States the other half, but the Government not being suable in such a case, he comes to Congress and asks that he be paid back the sum that the Government received.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then this bill covers the amount that went into the Treasury upon this confiscation.

Mr. POTTER. It covers that amount with interest. The sum that went into the Treasury was $10,311.84. The sum named in the bill is somewhat larger.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the amount named in the bill?

Mr. POTTER. Thirteen thousand two hundred and fifty-four dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the money which was paid into the national Treasury as the result of this confiscation ought to be refunded to the person whose property was sold; but only the actual amount so paid into the Treasury should be returned. For years past it has been the practice of the Government—I may say without variation—not to allow interest on claims.

Mr. POTTER. If anything is due to this man for the wrong committed upon him by the United States at the instance of this informer, it is the amount which the United States actually received, together with interest at 6 per cent.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3912) to reduce and fix the Adjutant-General's Department of the Army;

An act (H. R. No. 4853) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Dolly Varden to Clochette;

An act (H. R. No. 4861) granting a pension to Louis Heinley;

An act (H. R. No. 4734) to establish certain post-roads; and

An act (H. R. No. 3711) granting a pension to Martin D. Chandler.

HOLY CROSS MISSION, DAKOTA TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 411) for the relief of the Holy Cross Mission in the Territory of Dakota.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from sale or settlement, under the provisions of the pre-emption and homestead laws of Congress, one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands situated in sections 13 and 18, township 138, range 49, and section 18, township 138, range 48, as were included within the limits originally claimed and improved for the mission school-buildings, church, cemetery, &c., now occupied by the founders of the Holy Cross Mission at said place; the said land to include all school and church buildings and the cemetery thereon occupied.

By the second section the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to grant to the said Holy Cross Mission board the aforesaid land, for the sole and exclusive use of said Holy Cross Mission; provided that this shall not affect any bona fide claimant to said lands or any portion thereof.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

RIGHTS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 959) providing for the appointment of a commission to ascertain the right of subjects of Great Britain to lands in the territory which was the subject of the award of the Emperor of Germany, under treaties of 1846 and 1871, &c.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to say that a bill almost exactly like this was reported from the Committee on Public Lands at the last session and passed. A commissioner was appointed and has made his report. I do not think we ought to pass this bill.

The bill was laid aside.

FRANCES A. ROBINSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 271) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, in the State of Missouri, deceased, the sum of $2,000 in full for use and occupation of the foundery of the deceased, and property taken therefrom for the use of the United States Army, during the years 1862 and 1863.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Does this bill come from any committee? If it is not approved by a committee I must object to it.

Mr. COMINGO. I hope there will be no objection to that bill. It should have become a law long ago.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let us have some explanation of it.

Mr. COMINGO. In 1862 and 1863 the Army occupied the building in reference to which this charge is made, and destroyed some $20,000 of property, consisting of engines and machinery of one kind or another. They continued to occupy this building for a year or two as quarters. The committee in the Senate have cut down the claim from $20,000 and only report in favor of allowing $2,000 for rent and for machinery used. The claim has been before the committee of this House at one time and another and reported favorably upon by two or three committees. The Senate committee are unanimous in their report in favor of $2,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has it been before a committee of this House?

Mr. COMINGO. It has; one or two Congresses preceding this.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has there been a favorable report on it?

Mr. COMINGO. It has been reported on favorably by two committees, if not three.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it on the Private Calendar?

Mr. COMINGO. It has not been during this session. It has been reported on favorably two or three times, as I am informed. I trust there will be no objection to it. It is only to pay $2,000, when the property destroyed was worth $20,000.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, West Virginia.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to James Carskadon, P. M. Dayton, R. S. Dayton, James I. Barrick, Edmund Duling, and William Warner Smith, trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, Mineral County, West Virginia, to be used for church purposes only, the sum of $1,000, for the occupation and conversion to the use of the Army of the United States of the house of worship of said church at that place as a bakery, by the Commissary Department, from the 1st day of April, 1862, until the 28th day of November, 1864, under orders of the proper officers of the said Army, on which last-mentioned day the said house of worship, being so occupied, was destroyed by the rebel army.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has this bill been reported by any committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, members of the House of course perceive in passing bills of this character they come in conflict with the rule usually acted on, and that is that property so occupied in the actual theater of war by the Federal troops and subsequently destroyed by the rebel forces does not create a claim against the United States for which compensation should be made. Favorable action taken on this would in effect establish a new precedent.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say if my friend from Indiana had a Methodist Episcopal church or any other church in his district which had suffered in the war by destruction of its property it would have received compensation long ago. I know the rule laid down in these matters, but all these rules have exceptions. I do not know about this particular case; but in other like cases we have broken through the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Connecticut overlooks the facts in this case. I infer this was in the actual theater of war. If it is now proposed to pass this bill as a precedent, and it is understood we are to pay for all this sort of damage and spoliation, of course hundreds of millions will be necessary. It does not matter whether the State was in insurrection or not; but the question is whether this property was in the actual theater of war. Where the Government of the United States actually occupied property coming within its reach, the destruction of that property does not, according to the doctrine recognized by the House, create a claim for which the Government is responsible.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say a word in regard to these war claims. I have gone for every claim coming from the gentleman's State, and agreed to pay for every tea-vine and huckleberry-bush destroyed by the rebels in his district. I wish to say that I would have been more liberal on war claims than I should have been if it were not for my associates.

Mr. HOLMAN. At no time was it the theater of war.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Let me say there is a bill now upon the Speaker's table half a page behind this bill which we ought to reach and pass to-night in common decency to the forty thousand depositors of the Freedman's Bank; but unless we go along in order I do not see how it can be reached to-night. My colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] on the Committee on Banking and Currency, has it in charge; and although he has tried more than once to get it up, he has always been met with objection.

Mr. CONGER. I think we had better have a division on the bill now before the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 29.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the bill was not passed.

FREEDMAN'S BANK.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I now ask that my colleague on the committee [Mr. DURHAM] may be permitted to call up the Freedman's Savings Bank and Trust Company bill, in order to put it on its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. The colored members of the House do not want it passed.

Mr. RAINEY. Not unless it is amended, and there is no chance now for amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There is a difference of opinion as to the first two sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will observe, unless the order be reversed, the bill to which he refers would require a two-thirds vote to make it in order. It will be reached sooner than the gentleman expects by going on regularly.

GEORGE W. DAWSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 819) for the relief of George W. Dawson.

The bill, which was read, directs that the Secretary of the Treasury pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to George W. Dawson, late collector of the fifth internal-revenue district in the State of Maryland, the sum seventy-two dollars, the amount taken from his deputy collector, Frederick A. Dawson, in the month of July, 1864, by confederate troops under command of General Early.

The rules were suspended, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, and the bill was passed.

PEASLEY & M'CLARY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 821) for the relief of Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Has any member charge of this bill? If there be none it will be laid aside.

The bill was laid aside.

ANGELINE LOGAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 889) for the relief of Angeline Logan.

The SPEAKER. Is there any gentleman who has charge of this bill? [After a pause.] The bill will be laid aside without action.

J. MONTGOMERY AND T. E. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 951) for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that that bill may be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams the sum of $2,000, in full of all claims against the Government of the United States for damage, destruction, or appropriation of their property in Virginia, near the end of the Long Bridge, during the late war.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has that bill been considered by a committee?

Mr. SPEER. If the bill is not objected to I need not say anything in support of it. It is an honest bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Vermont surely knows that I never asked for the passage of private bills unless I believed them to be right.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not dispute that. I only desire to have this bill explained.

Mr. SPEER. Two of my constituents, John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams, at the beginning of the war came down from a county in my district and rented a hotel and farm on the Virginia side of the Long Bridge. General Runyon, in command of the United States troops, having passed over the Potomac, took possession of the tavern stand and also the farm occupied by these men and took all they had. One of them is now bankrupt. One of the parties, John Montgomery, filed his petition setting forth the taking possession of his premises by the United States Army under General Runyon and the loss which he had sustained, and asked that his damages might be assessed. Immediately after the property was taken possession of, General Runyon, the commanding general, organized a board to go upon the premises, examine them, hear evidence, and assess the damages of the petitioner. This board found there was $2,917.17 due to these parties. A bill for that amount was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Claims in the second session of the Forty-first Congress; but the report was made too late and the Senate did not pass the bill. The report was made by the late Senator Garrett Davis, of Kentucky; and this session the Senate Committee on Claims has again made a favorable report through Senator DAVIS, of West Virginia, which report I now hold in my hand. The amount has not been paid by the War Department because there was no law under which the Department could pay it.

Mr. MERRIAM. What is the amount?

Mr. SPEER. The amount found by the commissioners appointed by General Runyon was $2,917.17. The Senate has passed a bill for $2,000.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Why was not the award of that board of assessment paid?

Mr. SPEER. General Runyon appointed a board to assess the damages; but there was no law under which the amount of the assessment could be paid.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TERRE HAUTE AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1125) for the relief of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad Company, successor of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad Company, successor of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company, in the State of Indiana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,543.75, it being the amount due said company for carrying the United States mails, as found and ascertained by the Court of Claims.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 463) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873.

Mr. COTTON. I ask that the bill be passed with an amendment. The parties who wish this bill to pass wish also to have the amendment.

Mr. RUSK. The amendment will kill it.

Mr. LOWNDES. Let the bill be laid aside.

Mr. COTTON. I move to suspend the rules that the bill may be passed with an amendment.

The bill was read.

Mr. COTTON. This bill is for the benefit of the Insane Asylum. Dr. Nichols has been here several days endeavoring to get the bill through this Congress. It is to locate the line of the railroad. During last session of Congress the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] brought up the question of the location of this road, and this bill has been matured to give the road a proper location so that it shall furnish accommodation to the Insane Asylum. It is purely in the interest of the Government and of the Insane Asylum. I do not think that any gentleman in this House can have any objection to it. This does not authorize any new railroad, but simply makes this company locate its tracks so as to be for the benefit of the Government Insane Asylum. But the last section of the bill makes this provision:

SEC. 3. That no railroad or other corporation at present existing, or which may be hereafter incorporated, shall enter upon any lot, square, or other ground, or part thereof, owned or held by the United States within the limits of the District of Columbia, for any purposes whatever, except as may hereafter be allowed by special act of Congress.

I desire that that section shall be amended so that the railroad shall not enter upon Government property except in pursuance of acts of Congress which may have been heretofore or may be hereafter passed.

My amendment is to make it read, "except in pursuance of acts of Congress which may have been heretofore or may hereafter be passed." Of course that is right.

Mr. ARCHER. Why not strike out the third section? That would be the better way.

Mr. COTTON. I insist on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment I have indicated.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 45, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COTTON and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 57.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the bill was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. WINDOM one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the river and harbor bill, in place of Mr. WEST, excused.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a privileged question. I present a report from a committee of conference which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purpose, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 5, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 32, 33, 34, 35, 45, 79, and 85.

That the House recede from their disagreements to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 19, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 30, 31, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 46, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 61, 66, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 83, 84, 89, and 90.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted, insert the words "thirty-six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 9, with an amendment making the word "five" in line 14, page 4 of the bill, "six;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: From the words proposed to be inserted strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven," and in lieu of the following word "seven" insert the word "five," and in lieu of the succeeding word "seventy" insert the word "ninety;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: At the end of the amended paragraph add the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 59; and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the words "two assistant messengers, at $720 each per annum;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: From the words proposed to be inserted strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" strike out the following word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three;" and in line 8, page 43 of the bill, strike out "eight" and insert "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreements to the amendments numbered 62, 63, 64, 65, and agree to the same with amendments as follows, respectively: In lieu of the word proposed to be inserted by amendment 62 insert the word "eight," and in lieu of the word proposed to be inserted by amendment 63 insert the word "six," and in lieu of the word proposed to be inserted by amendment 64, insert the word "nine," and of the words proposed to be inserted by amendment 65 strike out the word "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 67, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Strike out of said amendment the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two," and strike out the following word "six," and in lieu thereof insert the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 68, and agree to the same with the following amendment: In lieu of the word "thirteen" of said amendment insert the word "eight;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment numbered 88, and from its disagreement to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike from the words proposed to be inserted the words "three hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same.

HORACE MAYNARD,
CHAS. O'NEILL,
J. C. ROBINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
JNO. J. INGALLS,
A. G. THURMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been a little unfortunate in the inability of the two Houses to agree upon the single point that is involved in the difference between them upon it, and which I attempted to explain this morning and probably did to the satisfaction of those who were present. This is the fifth conference. The difficulty arises upon the compensation of certain clerks and employés of the House, principally the clerks employed at the desk—the journal clerk of the House, his assistants, the tally-clerk, and the reading clerks.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman to come to this side of the House, so that we may hear what he is saying.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the right side of the House, or soon will be.

Mr. MAYNARD. As we passed the bill we made provision for the clerks and employés of the Senate and also of the House. The Senate amended the appropriations for the pay of their employés, increasing it to several clerks from $2,592 to $3,000. We were told that this was a ruse, that it was not sincere, that the object was to put in an appearance of raising the pay of their own employés in order to alarm gentlemen of the House so that they would consent to a reduction in the pay of their own clerks. I can hardly suppose, sir, that any large number of gentlemen in the House are legislating on this bill or on any other in that spirit.

As I stated this morning, in the last conference with the Senate the Senate conferees proposed to recede so far as the pay of the Chief Clerk and the journal clerk went, but they asked us to recede in regard to the pay of the reading clerks and the tally clerk and the assistant journal clerk. A motion to recede being made this morning by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] I believe, the House gave only thirty votes in favor of that proposition.

The last conference have agreed, and we report upon the principle that each House shall be intrusted by the other to regulate the number and the pay of its own employés. This report is based on that principle with the solitary exception of the two stenographers to committees. The Senate had reduced their pay from $5,000 each per annum to $4,200. One of two things will manifestly result from this being enacted into law: Either the stenographers will have a claim for the other $800 under the act of the last session by which their salary is fixed at $5,000, I believe, or they will be remitted back to the old practice of charging so much per folio for the amount of their work, which was found to be considerably over the sum of $5,000 a year, at which we fixed their salary by our legislation.

These are the principal points of difference. The other points, I believe, had been substantially agreed upon in the previous conferences; at least I am not aware of any serious disagreement. Unless some gentleman desires to be further informed about the character of this report, I will now ask for a vote.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES ATKINS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and have passed Senate bill for the relief of James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman not to object, as I must soon leave the Hall to serve on a conference committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. DURHAM. I object to any bill being taken out of its regular order.

REYNOLDS'S BRAKE FOR THE POWER-LOOM.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 537) for the extension of the patent known as Reynolds's patented brake for the power-loom.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to that bill.

The SPEAKER. If no one moves that it be passed it will be laid aside.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. The patentees of this invention, father and son, were engaged in the manufacture of power-looms. This invention is an improvement on a brake used in the power-loom. The cost of it is some two or three dollars; and the net amount received by these patentees and their representatives is in the neighborhood of $7,000. The patent was first issued for fourteen years. In the body of that patent it was dated in February, while at the foot of the patent it was dated in June or July. So little attention did these parties pay to their patent that they come now and say they were misled by the antedate in the body of the patent.

It is proved that the father died some time ago, and this patent was found among his papers. But his co-inventor, his son, was and is still interested in the patent, and was a partner in the business. The administrator never read the patent over, or he would have discovered the antedate. This is a small invention, for which they received in the neighborhood of $7,000 net profit. And yet because of their negligence they ask to have the patent extended or leave granted to make a new application. It is nothing short of negligence, for the administrator should have read the choses in action that came to him in his administrative capacity, or the other inventor should have read what he had in property, and thus advised himself of the facts. They now come and ask for an extension of the patent for seven years for an invention to be applied to power looms throughout the country.

I submit that in the judgment of the minority of the Committee on Patents this is not a case of sufficient equity to command the favorable action of the House.

Mr. SMART. I wish to say that the gentleman is mistaken as to the character of this invention. It is a brake to be applied to high-speed looms, to prevent the recoil when the loom is stopped suddenly; that is all there is of it.

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. I stated that it was a brake to be applied to high-speed looms.

Mr. SMART. It is true these inventors realized $7,000 in fourteen years. But it is also shown that they have made for others, in the saving of wear and tear of the loom, not less than $20,000 annually.

It was the fault of the administrator that the error in the deed was not discovered. These papers, when the father died, were all turned over to the surrogate's office. They were then brought to the Patent Office and went through the hands of the examiners, and the application was favorably considered. The majority of the Committee on Patents maintain that these men had not received such a reward for their invention as should deprive them of the advantage of an extension of the patent.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I am surprised that the gentleman should oppose this patent on the ground that the article manufactured under it is one costing but two or three dollars. Perhaps a single article may cost that sum; but what was the expense necessary to bring out this invention?

Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana. It is simply the result of experiments for many years in their own business, and one of quite a number of small patents that they took out.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is there any certainty that this patent, if renewed, would inure to the widow and heirs in any way?

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. Yes, sir; it will belong exclusively to them.

Mr. NIBLACK. Most usually the benefits of these patent extensions go to some assignees.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. The widow and heirs of this man will get the entire benefit of this extension.

Mr. NIBLACK. This may be a very meritorious case; but I confess I am very much opposed to the extension of patents as a general rule.

The bill was not passed; there being ayes 29, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN, (at six o'clock and ten minutes a. m.) I move that the House now take a recess.

Several MEMBERS. O, no!

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the House had better remain in session until the deficiency bill is received. A recess can then be taken without interfering with the public business.

A MEMBER. When will that bill come in?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I am informed the bill will be here in about fifteen minutes.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TOPEKA, KANSAS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the construction of a public building at Topeka, Kansas.

Mr. LOWE. I stand sponsor for that bill.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at private sale, or procure by condemnation, a suitable tract of ground in the city of Topeka, Kansas, and to cause to be erected thereon a fire-proof building, of brick or stone, suitable for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, and other Government offices in that city; said tract of land and the building thereon not to exceed in cost the sum of $150,000, which shall not be available until a valid title to the land shall be vested in the United States and the State of Kansas shall relinquish its jurisdiction over the same and all right to tax or assess the same while owned by the United States.

Mr. HANCOCK. Is this bill subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. This whole proceeding is dependent upon a two-thirds vote.

Mr. LOWE. I hope there will be no objection to this bill. It simply provides for obtaining a site in the capital of the State of Kansas, where the Federal Government has never spent a dollar for purposes of this kind.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. This bill is right, and ought to pass.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

STEAM RAILROADS IN WASHINGTON CITY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 861) for a commission to regulate and arrange tracks and depths of steam-railways within the city of Washington.

Objection being made, the bill was laid aside.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT COVINGTON, KENTUCKY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1019) to make an appropriation for public buildings at Covington, Kentucky.

Mr. ARTHUR. I ask that this bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read. It appropriates $150,000 for the completion of public buildings at Covington, Kentucky.

Mr. SPEER. This is an appropriation to carry out an existing law. I hope it will be passed.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DONATION OF PUBLIC BUILDING, ETC., TO OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1097) to donate to the State of Oregon a public building, lot, and material situated at The Dalles, Oregon.

The bill was read. It donates to the State of Oregon the mint building, material, and lot on which it is located, at The Dalles, Oregon. The donation is made on the condition that the building and lot shall be appropriated by the State of Oregon to the use of some educational or charitable institution.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT HARRISBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1270) to authorize the purchase of a site for public buildings at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at private sale, or procure by condemnation, a suitable tract of ground in the city of Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, for the erection thereon of a building for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in that city; and the sum of $160,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of such tract of ground. The sum appropriated is not to be available until a valid title to the land shall be vested in the United States and the State of Pennsylvania shall relinquish its jurisdiction over the same and all right to tax or assess the same while owned by the United States.

Mr. PACKER. I hope there will be no objection to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. PACKER. Mr. Speaker, I trust there will be no objection to the passage of this bill. The city of Harrisburgh is almost the only State capital in the country in which the General Government has not deemed it right to erect public buildings for the accommodation of its offices. Some years since, Congress, recognizing the importance of securing an eligible location for such buildings in that city, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination and report the terms upon which a suitable building site could be obtained. For various reasons, however, such site could not at that time be secured, but lately, as I am advised, the owners of several properties most favorably located in the central part of the city have expressed a readiness to sell at prices which are regarded as reasonable, and which would in all probability be entirely satisfactory to the officers of the Government.

The old and comparatively unsafe and insecure building which the Government has been renting from year to year and using as a post-office, for a long time too small for that purpose, has now, in consequence of the very large increase of population and business, become wholly inadequate and insufficient to provide the necessary postal facilities absolutely required at that place, and in my judgment the best interests of the Government and the convenience of the people alike demand that steps shall be taken for the purchase of ground and the erection of a suitable building at as early a day as practicable.

In addition to its importance as the capital of the great State of Pennsylvania, Harrisburgh has become one of the principal manufacturing cities of the State, and being also a great railroad center it has attracted population and capital and wealth and enterprise to such an extent that its permanent prosperity is assured, and it is now in every respect entitled to ask, if not to demand, that the same measure of justice that has been awarded to the capital cities of the other States of the Union shall not be denied to it.

With a population which has been almost doubled in the last ten or twelve years——

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Will the gentleman inform us what the population is?

Mr. PACKER. The population at this time is not much, if any, less than thirty-five thousand, and the postal business, I may add, has increased in even a larger ratio, and is now more than three times greater than it was ten years ago. The receipts of the post-office, sir, last year, by the official returns, amounted to $50,855, and if the receipts for the remaining portion of the current fiscal year should show as large an increase as the returns for the time that has already expired, the revenues for this year will be in excess of $65,000.

In the letter-carrier department alone of this office during the last year there were delivered by the carriers 380,717 mailed letters and 22,370 postal cards, and of local or dropped letters 22,496, 4,032 postal cards, and 248,266 newspapers. There were also collected by the carriers in the same period 144,914 letters, 7,112 postal cards, and 8,667 newspapers; making an aggregate of the letters, postal cards, and newspapers handled by the carriers in that time 838,584.

Mr. MERRIAM. What will the building cost when completed? What is the estimate?

Mr. PACKER. The bill merely provides for the purchase of a site, and the appropriation is for that purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 18.

So (no further count being demanded) the rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ACCEPTANCE OF PROPERTY IN TUNIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1296) to authorize the acceptance in behalf of the United States of America of certain real property occupied by the United States consul at Tunis.

The bill, which was read, provides that there shall be accepted in behalf of the Government the title to the residence now and for many years occupied by the United States consul at Tunis, which title has been courteously offered by His Highness the Bey of Tunis. It also provides after the proper muniment of title aforesaid shall have been furnished it shall be lodged in the Department of State.

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

FREE YOUNG MEN'S BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1222) to authorize the trustees of the "Free Young Men's Benevolent Association" to sell and convey square No. 272 in the city of Washington.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs that Guerdon Snowden, Henry Logan, Anthony Hickman, Joseph Shorter, and Hamilton Martin, trustees of the "Free Young Men's Benevolent Association" of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and also trustees of "The Colored Union Benevolent Association" of said city, and their successors in office, to subdivide, sell, and convey a certain square of ground in said city, known and described as square No. 272, now held by said trustees for the said associations, and heretofore used in part as a burial-ground for the dead, free and discharged from any trust, expressed or implied, and free from any right, title, or claim, of any and all lot-holders in said burial-ground; that all conveyances made in pursuance of any sale made by virtue hereof shall pass a fee-simple for the part of said square so conveyed; that the said trustees shall out of the proceeds of said sales pay and discharge the incumbrances existing upon said square; and the surplus thereof they shall apply for the benefit and improvement of "Mount Pleasant Plains Cemetery," in said District of Columbia.

Mr. COTTON. I ask to have the bill passed.

Mr. RAINEY. In the absence of any explanation in regard to that bill I feel bound to object to it.

Mr. COTTON. I have been spoken to by the gentleman's own friends to have that bill passed.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know anything about it, but I will take the gentleman's word and withdraw my objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. What is the bill?

Mr. COTTON. It is all right.

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

PATENT OFFICE GAZETTE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1297) to provide for the republication of the first volume of the Patent Office Gazette.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Commissioner of Patents to have printed at the Government Printing Office the letter-press of the first year of the Official Gazette, for the use of the Patent Office.

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1210) to provide for the distribution of the regular official editions of certain public documents and of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DONNAN. This bill contains nine sections. There is no new material legislation. It provides for a change in the distribution of documents, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and has been carefully prepared by the Senate committee.

Mr. RUSK. I object.

Mr. DONNAN. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. If we are to vote on the bill it should be read.

Mr. DONNAN. Let the bill be passed over for the present. I will ask that it be considered at another time.

The bill was laid aside.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 736) to change the boundaries of the eastern and western judicial districts of the State of Texas, and to fix the times and places of holding courts in the same.

Mr. HERNDON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLAMETTE VALLEY AND COAST RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1082) granting to the Willamette Valley and Coast Railroad Company a right of way through the public lands for a narrow-gauge railroad.

Mr. CLYMER. The general law passed not long since covers that bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is true; the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands passed by this House covers that bill, and therefore I move it be laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

A MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that that body had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriation to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS-BANK AND TRUST COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1349) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. DURHAM. I would like to say to the House if they desire to read the bill, it is precisely like the House bill.

Mr. RAINEY. I should like to have the bill read, as I propose to move an amendment to it.

Mr. DURHAM. I will not permit any amendment to be offered.

Mr. MERRIAM. The House will give the gentleman from South Carolina an opportunity to amend the bill.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to put the bill on its passage.

Mr. CESSNA. Under the rule adopted is it in order to amend the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is on the floor.

Mr. DURHAM. I understand some gentlemen wish to have the bill read, and as a matter of course it must be read.

The bill, which was read, in its first section provides that so much of the seventh section of the act entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, as authorizes the selection and appointment of three commissioners be, and the same is thereby, repealed.

The second section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to appoint one commissioner, who shall execute a bond to the United States, with good sureties, in the penal sum of $100,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as commissioner aforesaid, and take an oath faithfully to perform his duties; which bond shall be executed in the presence of said Secretary, and approved by him, and by him safely kept; and when said bond shall have been executed, and oath taken, then said commissioner shall be invested with the possession and legal title to all the property of said company for the purposes of the act and the act of June 20, 1874, and shall have all the rights, prerogatives, and privileges, and perform all the duties, that were conferred and enjoined upon the three commissioners mentioned in said act of June 20, 1874.

The third section provides that said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right and authority to compound and compromise debts due to and liabilities of the company.

The fourth section provides that said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right and authority to sell any of the property of said company, at public or private sale, as, in his judgment, he may deem best; and to buy in, for the benefit of the company, any property which may be offered for sale to pay debts and liabilities to said company, if, in his judgment, said property is being sacrificed by said sale; and to make to the purchasers of property sold by him deeds of conveyance for their respective purchases.

The fifth section provides that said commissioner shall not engage in any other business pursuit while winding up the affairs of said company, and shall by the tenth day of each annual session of Congress make a written report to Congress of his proceedings up to the first day of said session; and for his services as commissioner aforesaid he shall receive an annual salary of $5,000, to be paid out of the funds of said institution.

The sixth section provides that whenever said commissioner is prepared to make a dividend to the depositors, he is authorized and directed, through the United States Treasurer, to place in the various depository banks of the United States which are convenient to said depositors an amount sufficient to pay them; and the officers of said banks shall pay the depositors or their assignees, and take receipts from them in such way and manner as shall be prescribed by said commissioner and the Secretary of the Treasury; and said evidences of payment shall be returned by said officers to the commissioner, and by him preserved; provided that where there are no depository banks of the United States, then said commissioner may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, pay the depositors in said localities in such way as he may deem best.

The seventh section provides that said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe such form as he may deem right and proper for the depositors to transfer their claims; provided every such transfer shall state the amount of the claim transferred, and the amount actually received for the same.

The eighth section provides that said commissioner shall make payments to those depositors only whose pass-books have been properly verified and balanced, unless said pass-books have been lost or destroyed; then, upon satisfactory proof of such loss or destruction, and the amount due them, he may pay as though they had pass-books.

The ninth section provides that said commissioner is thereby authorized and directed, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to employ some competent attorney at law to investigate the manner in which said company has been managed by its trustees and others having control of the same; and if in the judgment of said attorney the affairs of said company have been mismanaged or managed fraudulently and corruptly, then with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury said commisssoner shall cause such civil and criminal proceedings to be instituted in the courts against those participating in said mismangement or fraudulent and corrupt management as he shall deem right and proper to attain the ends of justice.

He shall pay fees and costs of suits out of the funds in his hands as commissioner aforesaid, provided that the aggregate amount to be paid to attorneys shall not exceed $5,000 for any one year.

The tenth section provides that if from any cause there shall be any considerable delay in making a dividend to the depositors, then said commissioner may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, invest the funds on hand in United States bonds until such time as he may be prepared to make a dividend, as directed under the act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not desire to speak in support of the bill except in the way of response to anything that may be said against it.

Mr. BROMBERG. How much time is there for discussion on this bill?

The SPEAKER. The resolution under which the House is acting allows five minutes' debate on each side on a bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, the bill which was passed last year, June 20, 1874, provided for this concern being put into bankruptcy. It provides—

That whenever it shall be deemed advisable by the trustees of said corporation to close up its entire business, then they shall select three competent men, not connected with the previous management of the institution and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be known and styled commissioners, whose duty it shall be to take charge of all the property and effects of said Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, close up the principal and subordinate branches.

The act gave the trustees the power to select these three men. Now it is proposed in this bill to disregard entirely the trustees in the selection, and to let the Secretary of the Treasury appoint one commissioner. I doubt whether it would be wise to do that. I have some doubt as to the power to do it, and I think it would perhaps be better to let the concern go into bankruptcy in the usual way under the law than to take the responsibility out of the hands of the three commissioners and put it into the hands of one man.

There are some good provisions in this bill, some powers which ought to be granted to the commissioners in order to settle up the concern; and I think the thanks of the friends of the institution are due to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DUHRAM] for the pains he has taken. The ninth section especially is one which should be enacted in some way; the section which authorizes the employment of some competent attorney at law to investigate the manner in which the company has been managed by its trustees and others having control of the same, and, if he sees cause, to institute such civil and criminal proceedings against those who may have participated in mismanagement or fraudulent and corrupt management, as he shall deem right and proper to attain the ends of justice.

I should like to put on the record here my firm conviction that there has been such gross mismanagement there that not alone civil suits should be brought, but if I am not greatly mistaken, some criminal prosecutions should be brought.

It would be well to grant those powers. But I do object to giving them to but one single commissioner. To do so will in the first place give the greatest dissatisfaction to the sixty thousand depositors of that institution, who are almost without exception colored men scattered all over the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have not had my five minutes yet. I desire to say a word or two more. I was saying that this will produce well-grounded dissatisfaction all over the country among the sixty thousand depositors if you put this duty and responsibility in the hands of one single commissioner who will have control over this $3,000,000 and over the suits to be instituted, the compromises to be made, the sales of property to be carried out. One of these commissioners is a colored man of high standing. But the active manager is a young man from the Treasury Department. Now, suppose that this one alone is appointed. The other two may be thrown out and this young man left as the sole commissioner.

Mr. FARWELL. They are all turned out.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It is intended by this bill that only one commissioner shall be appointed; and it will be the most natural thing in the world to suppose that a man will be appointed who is now in charge of the settlement of these matters and familiar with them. But I believe you could not make these depositors all over the country more unhappy than by putting in as commissioner that man, or any one man, or perhaps any one colored man. Indeed, you gentlemen yourselves, if you were creditors of such an institution, would not like to have all its assets put into the hands of one man, with power to buy in at sales, to compound suits; in short, to do anything and everything, controlling these $3,000,000, and having the entire disbursement and distribution of the same.

I propose an amendment to strike out the first two sections, which provide for a single commissioner, and to make corresponding alterations in the other sections, substituting the plural for the singular number.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not admit any amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move to amend by striking out the first two sections and making changes in the other sections to correspond with three commissioners instead of one.

Mr. DURHAM. My motion was to suspend the rules and put the bill on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] has the right to test the sense of the House on his motion that the bill be passed as it stands.

Mr. DURHAM. I claim the right to respond briefly to the gentleman from Connecticut. I know there is a great deal said, Mr. Speaker, about sympathy with these colored people. But these colored people, these seventy-two thousand depositors throughout the United States, do not care very much about sympathy provided only they can get their money. They have been sympathized with by their friends until they have been literally robbed. These friends of the colored people have hugged them around the neck with one hand while they have stolen the money out of their pockets with the other.

The gentleman from Connecticut is afraid a certain gentleman will be appointed to manage this institution. Now, I do not know who the Secretary of the Treasury intends to appoint. But I will not stop to talk about that.

Now, I do not know who the Secretary of the Treasury intends to appoint, but I do say that if he appoints Mr. Leopold he will appoint an honest and competent man to attend to this matter; a man who has discharged his duties and managed its affairs, without reference to the two other commissioners, very much to the benefit of the colored people.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, I desire to ask the gentleman a qxestion. The only point is whether there shall be one or three commissioners. What is the objection to three commissioners?

Mr. DURHAM. The objection is that it will cost more; and if you amend the bill, it has to go back to the Senate and cannot possibly pass at this session of Congres. There are seventy thousand of these people suffering. There are about two thousand who are in moderate circumstances and do not appear to need the dividend; but I say to you if you have any regard for the feelings or welfare of the colored people you will not stop to inquire whether it is best to have one commissioner or three. I believe that the Secretary of the Treasury will appoint a competent man, a man who can take charge of this institution and wind it up. Gentlemen talk about not trusting one man. Look at the case of the Ocean Bank in New York, which fell into the hands of a receiver, and over $2,000,000 passed through his hands and nothing was lost. In the case of a national bank you would appoint a receiver to take charge of it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. We have been all winter investigating that man.

Mr. DURHAM. And a majority of the committee reported that he did right.

Mr. MERRIAM. But one portion of the committee made a different report.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know where that majority of the committee was.

Mr. DURHAM. I am not to be drawn off from my remarks by these side issues. It is exceedingly strange that gentlemen should endeavor to do it. The Committee of the Senate recommend the appointment of one commissioner; and I say that, so far as the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency are concerned, they thought one commissioner preferable to three, for the reason that we want to get as much out of this property as possible for those who have been swindled by the very men calling themselves their friends, as admitted by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. RAINEY. I have but a word to say. I had hoped that this bill would have been acted upon by the Committee on Banking and Currency at an early day, that we might have had an opportunity to discuss its merits and also its demerits.

Sir, there is no one upon this floor who could feel a deeper interest in this subject than I feel. I myself have been a depositor in this bank, and have incurred losses through it, and therefore I think that I have a right to have an opinion in this matter, not as it applies to myself, but to those others who made the largest deposits in the bank. In the State of South Carolina I presume that half a million dollars was put in this bank by the colored people, none of which was loaned in that State, but $144,000 of which was loaned out in the city of Washington on real estate here, right here in this very city, and these very loans were made before the authority was granted by the law of 1870.

Now, sir, when the officers of this institution would take advantage of such a class of people as were the depositors in this bank, who had placed great confidence in them, and take their deposits and put the money on real estate which was subject to so great a shrinkage as the investments of that bank were subjected to, I say that no one man should handle over $2,000,000 of money belonging to the poor people of the country. Sir, the depositors in this bank are the poorest class of people in the Southern States—the laboring classes of the South; the poor black men who are striving by saving money to clothe their families and educate their children; to buy for themselves lands and houses—and these people have been defrauded most shamefully.

What I want to say is this: I am opposed to any one man holding the assets of that bank, having them wholly at his disposal. I do not care who he is, whether he be colored or white, whether he be a German or an Irishman, it makes no difference to me. I want no one man to handle the assets of that bank.

I am in favor of three commissioners, because I believe the responsibility should be divided. We should have three, to assist each other in the discharge of the important duties connected with the adjustment of the affairs of this corporation. I therefore would like to have this bill amended so as to secure the appointment of three commissioners. Suppose you appoint but one; what provision will there be in case of his sickness or in any other case that may call him away from the duties?

When he is called away the important duties of the bank may be left in the hands of irresponsible subordinates, who give no bonds at all. If I could have my way I would like to have this bill amended so as to have three commissioners appointed, each of them giving a bond of $100,000 separately, not jointly, as now. If that could be done, good men put in, and the assets of the bank properly guarded, I believe that in a very short time something would be realized by which the poor depositors would be somewhat benefited.

Mr. RANDALL. As one of the minority of the Committee on Banking and Currency I desire to state that I concur in everything which has been said by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY.] I think there ought to be three commissioners, with equal salaries, equal duties, and equal responsibilities in every respect.

Mr. RAINEY. I desire to say this: I am opposed to this bill, and prefer to have it defeated rather than it should be passed in its present shape.

The question was upon suspending the rules and passing the bill; and upon a division there were ayes 9, noes not counted.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to introduce a bill for action now, which is the bill just disposed of, amended as I indicated in my remarks.

Mr. BROMBERG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this Freedman's Bank bill open to amendment and debate now? I thought it had been defeated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under the order of the House the bill is not open to amendment and discussion at this time.

Mr. MERRIAM. This bank will undoubtedly pay ninety cents on the dollar, although the impression has gone out that it will pay much less.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to explain what he considers to be the rule adopted by the House. It is that on a bill being reached on the Speaker's table it shall be voted upon directly, five minutes on either side being allowed for discussion. If the bill shall fail to pass by a two-thirds vote it is laid aside.

Mr. BROMBERG. That is my understanding of the rule.

The SPEAKER. If a bill is open to amendment then, a single bill might hold the House two or three hours and neutralize all the effect of the order made by the House.

Mr. DURHAM. And this bill is defeated?

The SPEAKER. It is.

BOARD OF AUDIT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1240) to extend the time within which the board of audit for the District of Columbia may receive, audit, and allow certain claims that have never been presented to said board.

The bill provides that the board of audit constituted by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, may receive, audit, and allow just claims against the District of the first and second classes mentioned in the sixth section of said act and claims for refunding sewer taxes, notwithstanding the limit of time for presentation contained in said act and in the resolution to continue said board of audit approved December 21, 1874, provided that such claims shall be presented prior to the 1st day of July next.

Mr. COTTON. That bill is all right, and is recommended by the commissioners for the District of Columbia.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

STAMPS ON BREWERS' CASKS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1237) to amend section 3342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to affixing stamps on brewers' casks.

Mr. MERRIAM. What is this bill?

Mr. RUSK. The bill is all right; it requires the stamp to be affixed on the bung of the cask.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3511) to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3818) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 4445) to incorporate the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4816) to authorize the consolidation of the Auburn City National Bank and the First National Bank of Auburn, New York.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to inquire of the Chair if there is any good reason why the House cannot now take a recess?

The SPEAKER. The House should first pass upon the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill and send them to a committee of conference; otherwise there may be danger that the bill will be lost.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say that it is expected that the deficiency bill will be returned from the Senate in ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will not make the motion at this time.

F. V. HAYDEN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1185) for the relief of F. V. Hayden.

The bill was read. It provides that the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of F. V. Hayden, geologist in charge of the survey of the Territories, shall credit F. V. Hayden with the sum of $3,825, on account of loss of that amount, in 1872, by highway robbery, committed on his clerk while traveling on stage-coach between Virginia City, Montana, and Fort Hall, Idaho, bearing that sum of money from one division of the survey to the other; such amount having been lost without any fault or neglect of Hayden or his clerk.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

JOSEPH H. COLTON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1156) for the relief of Joseph H. Colton.

The bill requests the President of the United States to call upon the government of Bolivia to make payment of the money admitted by itself to be due, with interest thereon, according to the decree of the said government of Bolivia of February 1, 1872, to Joseph H. Colton, for maps engraved for that government under a contract made in 1858.

The bill was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. This is the last bill on the printed Calendar.

TWENTY-CENT SILVER PIECE.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to have passed at this time a bill reported favorably by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It is a bill (S. No. 468) authorizing the coinage of a twenty-cent piece of silver at the mints of the United States.

The bill was read. It provides that there shall be, from time to time, coined at the mints of the United States, conformably in all respects to the coinage act of 1873, a coin of silver of the denomination of twenty cents and of the weight of five grams; the twenty-cent piece shall be a legal-tender at its nominal value for any amount not exceeding five dollars in any one payment; that in adjusting the weight of the twenty-cent piece, the deviation of the standard weight shall not exceed one and one-half grains; and in weighing a large number of pieces together, when delivered by the coiner to the superintendent, and by the superintendent to the depositor, the deviation from the standard weight shall not exceed two-hundredths of an ounce in one thousand pieces; that all laws now in force in relation to the coins of the United States and the coining of the same shall, as far as applicable, have full force and effect in relation to the coin herein authorized, whether those laws are penal or otherwise, and whether they are for preventing counterfeiting or abasement, for protecting the currency, for regulating the process of coining and the preparation therefor, or for the security of the coin, or for any other purpose.

Mr. MERRIAM. In consideration of the fact that this twenty-cent piece is only to be used on the Pacific coast, I waive any objection.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

JOSEPH H. MADDOX.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage a bill (H. R. No. 3789) for the relief of Joseph H. Maddox. This bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (already published) was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. While it may be proper in certain cases to refund money that has gone into the Treasury, yet it seems to me a very dangerous precedent to pay for the spoliation of property held by loyal citizens in the disloyal States under the authority of Treasury warrants under the proclamation of 1863.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will allow me to refresh his memory. He was present in the committee-room when this bill was acted upon, and voted in favor of reporting it.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, there were—ayes 35, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 58.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred the amendments of the Senate to the deficiency appropriation bill, have directed me to report them back and recommend severally concurrence or non-concurrence as will appear when the amendments are read.

The various amendments of the Senate were read, and respectively concurred in or non-concurred in as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. By consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I offer the following amendment to the amendments of the Senate:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to FRANK MOREY the amount given him by resolution of the House of Representatives of the Forty-first Congress of June 2, 1870, for expenses as contestant in the Forty-first Congress, $3,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. That proposition has already been rejected by the House, and I do not think we ought now to adopt it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] yields to me to offer the following amendment to come in after the provision with reference to the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to give John S. Chapman, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of the State of Louisiana, credit in the settlement of his accounts for the sum of $000 taxes collected, which was lost or stolen while in course of transmittal in a registered letter through the post-office.

Mr. MOREY. This matter has been examined by the Committee on Ways and Means, and they have reported favorably upon it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I move the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling and adjusting the revenue, disbursing, and other accounts of James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth collection district of Georgia, are hereby directed to credit said Atkins with the sum of $14,819.33, on account of loss of that amount by default of deputies in his employ, the amount being lost without neglect or fault of said Atkins.

Mr. GARFIELD. This man I know to be a true and faithful officer. The amendment only enables him to settle his accounts by allowing him the credit of $14,819.33 on account of loss of that amount by default of deputies and not from any fault or neglect of his own. I hope it will be allowed to go on this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. PARKER of Missouri, Mr. AVERILL, and Mr. NIBLACK.

PONTON WAGON-BRIDGE AT DUBUQUE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that it shall be lawful for any person or persons, company or corporation, authorized by the laws of Iowa, Illinois, or Wisconsin, to construct a pile and ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, so as to connect with the opposite shore of the said river, in either of the States of Wisconsin or Illinois; said bridge to be built subject, except as therein modified, to all the terms, requirements, and limitations contained in the act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a ponton railway-bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," approved June 6, 1874, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

The second section provides that the bridge shall be constructed with a suitable ponton-draw of not less than five hundred feet in width, located over the main channel of the river; provided that said bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plan and specifications for its construction have been submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, nor until he shall approve the plan and the location of said bridge; and if any change be made in the plan of construction of said bridge at any time, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction, or any alteration of said bridge that may be directed at any time by Congress or the Secretary of War, shall be made at the cost and expense of the owners thereof.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Commerce unanimously recommend the passage of this bill.

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the House take a recess until ten and a half o'clock.

The SPEAKER. It ought not to be later than ten o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will make it ten o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman to make it half past nine o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I will make it nine and a half o'clock. I move that we take a recess from now until nine and a half o'clock.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I rise to submit a report from the committee of conference on the bounty bill. It was agreed that this conference report should be taken up at eight o'clock this morning, and it is not fair to thrust it aside in this way.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 56.

Mr. CONGER. I hope we will not take a recess, but wait until the river and harbor appropriation bill comes in.

Mr. COBURN. I demand the yeas and nays on taking a recess.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I think we ought to wait for the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. CLYMER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. All the appropriation bills are now in conference, every one of them.

Mr. GUNCKEL. There was an agreement, as I have said, that this bounty bill should come up at eight o'clock, and I hope gentlemen will not break that agreement.

The SPEAKER. On the motion for taking a recess a quorum has not voted. Does the gentleman desire further count?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I demand a further count.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. GUNCKEL and Mr. CLYMER as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 50.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Having the floor for a privileged question, is a motion to take a recess in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to take a recess is of course in order.

And then, at two minutes to eight o'clock a. m., (Wednesday, March 4,) the House took a recess until half past nine o'clock a. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past nine o'clock a. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] is on the floor to present a report of a committee of conference.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have here a bill which was reported by Mr. Mellish before he left us.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I decline to yield.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope there will be unanimous consent to pass this bill before we adjourn.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I present the report of the committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3341) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union having met, after full and free conference agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its vote non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

LEWIS B. GUNCKEL,
JOHN COBURN,
CHARLES A. ELDREDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
HANNIBAL HAMLIN,
JOHN W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will call the previous question at once. We all understand it as well as we would after discussion.

Mr. ARCHER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio how much the conference committee give additional to that which he estimated the bounties would amount to when he addressed the House on the bill?

Mr. GUNCKEL. In my former estimate I deducted one-third for local bounties. General LOGAN, in charge of the bill in the Senate, called it two-fifths; others make it only one-fourth. If I am right, it adds one-third to the estimate of the bill as it passed the House. As I stated when the bill was first considered in the House, we aimed in our original bill to do justice to every soldier and afford every one just and proper relief and yet to take a smaller amount from the Treasury than proposed by any former bill. But, contrary to our judgment and wishes it was amended and its provisions enlarged and cost increased, first by the House and then by the Senate, so that it is now a very different bill from what it was when reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. It obviates the inequalities between the men of the East and the West complained of before, and is claimed to be more perfectly just and equitable. It certainly is more comprehensive, and provides for many thousands not included in the original bill; but for this very reason it will cost much more money. Just how much more I would not undertake to say, for I have not had time to revise my former estimate.

Mr. ARCHER. Does the gentleman believe that $150,000,000 will be sufficient to meet the obligations this bill will impose upon the Government?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I believe that one-fifth of the amount which the gentleman names will be sufficient—say $30,000,000.

Mr. CESSNA. I have not heard the gentleman from Ohio distinctly. Does he say that this bill is to cost the Government but $30,000,000 or that the Senate has increased it by that amount, adding $30,000,000 to what was in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. GUNCKEL. There is an addition only of about $10,000,000 to what was estimated on the House bill. I estimated that the House bill would involve a cost of about $20,000,000. This would add some $10,000,000 more. In other words, my estimate would be about the same made by the Senate committee, $30,000,000. I do not wish to deceive the House. I admit that there has not been and cannot, in the nature of the case, be any accurate calculation. It is mere estimate, conjecture, and may prove to be larger or smaller. Well-informed gentlemen have made the estimate very much larger, while others equally well posted have made it very considerably less.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope there will be no hesitancy in passing this bill.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I desire only to say further that this bill is not such as I should have preferred myself or such as the Military Committee would have recommended. But the House chose to amend the bill reported by the committee; and the Senate has chosen further to amend it, enlarging its provisions and increasing its cost. With the conference committee it was a question of life or death to the bounty bill. It was this or nothing. We could not get ours. We felt it our duty to take theirs rather than fail altogether in this great act of justice. Its only objection is its cost; but if an honest debt, we should not hesitate to pay because the amount happens to be large and our Treasury not very full.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell us whether the Senate made any amendment to this bill except to strike out the State bounties from the deductions and to provide that bonds may be used under the law of 1870 for the payment of bounties, if necessary, under the present condition of the Treasury?

Mr. GUNCKEL. That is all that is stricken out. The State bounties are not to be deducted. The only deductions are Government bounties paid by the United States. The other addition to the bill is the providing of the ways and means. It is provided that if from time to time there is no money in the Treasury not appropriated available for the purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow money by issuing and selling bonds under existing laws. The amendment of the Senate relieves the bill of the objection the New England men had to it, and should have their united support. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House agree to the report of the conference committee?

Mr. MERRIAM. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 41, not voting 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Banning, Barber, Barry, Bland, Bradley, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Caulfield, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Clinton, L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Fort, Freeman, Gunckel, Hagans, Harmer, Benjamin W. Thomas, Thornburgh, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Wallace, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—97.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4692) making appropriations for the payment of claims allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the deficiency appropriation bill, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. STEVENSON as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. No. 3718) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Arthur;

A bill (H. R. No. 3713) granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper;

A bill (H. R. No. 4755) granting a pension to William Lyon;

A bill (H. R. No. 965) granting a pension to Samuel Purcell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4329) granting a pension to William S. Small;

A bill (H. R. No. 4773) granting a pension to Margaret Pattison;

A bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey;

A bill (H. R. No. 4746) authorizing the Second National Bank of Watkins, New York, and the Slater National Bank of North Providence, Rhode Island, to change their names;

A bill (H. R. No. 4800) granting a pension to John H. Looby;

A bill (H. R. No. 4763) granting a pension to Lafayette Briggs;

A bill (H. R. No. 4767) for the relief of Ferdinand Monti; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4771) granting a pension to Charles A. Drake.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAWYER. I desire to submit the report of the committee of conference upon the river and harbor appropriation bill, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading of this report at the Clerk's desk gives no clear understanding of what is contained in this bill. I ask the gentleman submitting the report to state to the House what important changes have been made in the bill since it was passed by the House.

Mr. SAWYER. The principal changes made by the Senate and agreed to by the committee of conference are these: Increases of appropriation for Tennessee River, $200,000; for the Great Kanawha, $200,000; for Cape Fear River, $50,000; for Saint Joseph River, Michigan, $20,000; for Jersey City, $25,000; for New Castle, Delaware, $20,000, &c. In the aggregate the increase of the appropriations in the bill since it left the House amounts to $622,317. The Senate have struck out nothing from the bill as it passed the House, but have increased the appropriations to the amount I have indicated and have added to the bill the Senate jettee system for the mouth of the Mississippi River. The jettee bill that passed the Senate involves the expenditure of $3,000,000 less than the bill passed by the House, and is a bill better guarded than the bill of the House.

Mr. BECK. I would like to ask the amount of the appropriation for the breakwater at Cleveland, Ohio?

Mr. SAWYER. It is $50,000.

Mr. BECK. What is the total cost of that work?

Mr. SAWYER. Somewhere in the neighborhood of a million dollars. That appropriation, however, was not put in by the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The House never heard this bill read. It seems that $50,000 have been appropriated for the breakwater at Cleveland, the lowest estimate for the work being $1,000,000 and the highest estimate $2,000,000.

Mr. SAWYER. The gentleman is mistaken as to the amount that work will cost.

Mr. STANARD. Does not the gentleman believe that the commerce of the lakes and the harbor at Cleveland are of sufficient importance to have a breakwater and a harbor of refuge?

Mr. BECK. They have one now. This appropriation has been put in in order to get votes for the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. DAWES. What is the increase of appropriations made in this bill since it left the House?

Mr. SAWYER. A little over $600,000.

Mr. DAWES. Does that include the expense of the jettee system?

Mr. SAWYER. It does not. There is no appropriation for the jettee system except $5,000 for surveys. The aggregate amount appropriated by this bill is $6,600,000. Nothing was struck out of the bill by the Senate, but that body added $600,000.

Mr. COX. I desire to say that when this bill was before the House I protested against its passage without examination, because it was a mischievous mode of passing such a bill under suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a very important fact to state now.

Mr. COX. This is bad legislation, and I enter my protest against it now and for the future because of the bad system it inaugurates. This bill comes back from the Senate with $600,000 added to it. We cannot possibly call the yeas and nays upon it and defeat it at this late hour of the session. But one thing it is never too late to say: if I have anything to say about legislation hereafter, no appropriation, with my consent, shall go through this House without being read and thoroughly understood.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman being a candidate for your place, Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is a declaration of principles on his part to obtain favor.

Mr. COX. The gentleman may retire to the mountains, and others will take care of his suggestion as to the organization of the House; or he may retire to Constantinople, where I understand he is going.

Mr. SAWYER. I call for a vote on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 23, noes 110; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE and Mr. COX called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 26 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report of the committee was then agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN ALABAMA AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Alabama Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law:

Resolved by the House of Representatives. (the Senate concurring,) That five thousand extra copies of the reports of the Special Committee on Political Affairs in Alabama and in Mississippi, together with the testimony, be printed for the use of the House.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table and pass at this time Senate bill No. 976, to promote economy and efficiency in the marine-hospital service. That bill has been examined by the members of the Committee on Commerce, and they concur in the recommendation that the bill be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared a schedule of the average number of seamen required in the safe and ordinary navigation of registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels of the United States, basing such schedule upon the differences in rig, tonnage, and kind of traffic. And from and after the completion and publication of said schedule hospital dues, at the rate and for the periods prescribed in sections 4585 and 4587 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be assessed and collected from the master or owner of each vessel subject to such dues upon the average number of seamen as set forth in said schedule: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to debar masters or owners of vessels from deducting such dues from each seaman's wages as by law now authorized.

SEC. 2. That from and after May 1, 1875, every vessel subject to hospital tax, except vessels required by law to carry crew lists, shall have and keep on board, subject to inspection and verification at all times by any officer of the customs, a seaman's time-book, which shall be furnished by the Treasury Department, and in which time-book shall be entered the name, date of shipment, and date of discharge of every seaman employed on board such vessel; and the master or owner of any vessel subject to hospital tax, vessels carrying crew lists as above excepted, shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty dollars for each and every seaman found employed on board his vessel without a corresponding entry in said time-book; and the sums so forfeited shall be collected by the collector of customs upon the sworn statement of the customs officers who make the inspections, and shall be paid into the Treasury to the credit of the marine-hospital fund for the general purposes of which fund said sums are hereby appropriated.

SEC. 3. That the term "seaman," wherever employed in legislation relating to the marine-hospital service, shall be held to include any person employed on board in the care, preservation, or navigation of any vessel, or in the service, on board, of those engaged in such care, preservation, or navigation.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury may rent or lease such marine-hospital buildings, and the lands appertaining thereto, as he may deem advisable in the interests of the marine-hospital service; and the proceeds of such rents or leases are hereby appropriated for the said service.

SEC. 5. That insane patients of said service shall be admitted into the Government Hospital for the Insane upon the order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be cared for therein until cured or until removed by the same authority; and the charge for each such patient shall not exceed $4.50 a week, which charge shall be paid out of the marine-hospital fund.

SEC. 6. That sick and disabled seamen of foreign vessels and of vessels not subject to hospital dues may be cared for by the marine-hospital service at such rates under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 7. That the compensation of the supervising surgeon shall be paid out of the marine-hospital fund at the rate of $4,000 per annum.

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PAY OF CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to pay to all clerks and employés of the House of Representatives not otherwise provided for, and who do not receive annual salaries, their salaries for one month from the close of this session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 4772) granting a pension to Richard G. Mobley;
An act (H. R. No. 4757) granting a pension to Fremontia Young;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) authorizing the acceptance by Captain C. H. Wells of the United States Navy, of the cross of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 2179) to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia;
An act (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis, first lieutenant Company F, Sixty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers;
An act (H. R. No. 4573) to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin; and An act (H. R. No. 4786) granting a pension to Sarah B. Howe and Mary Cranston.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 831) for the relief of D. R. Haggard; and An act (S. No. 1198) authorizing the President to nominate Henry S. Wetmore a lieutenant in the Navy on the retired list.

The message further announced that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House for printing the eulogies delivered upon the death of the late members of the House, Mr. Hooper, Mr. Hersey, Mr. Crocker, and Mr. Rice.

M. VON ENTRESS FUERSTENECK.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The bill was read. It appropriates $1,455.20 to be paid to M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second lieutenant of Company A of the Sixty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers, to cover a period of service from August 30, 1863, to December 21, 1864, inclusive, at which time he was commissioned and actually performed duty as a second lieutenant, but was not mustered in.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4692) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman state briefly the effect of those amendments?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The Senate has referred back to the commissioners of claims a few claims which were in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. COX. Is that the only change?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It is.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senate has referred back some claims that have already been several times referred to the commissioners. There was no reason for thus referring them; it was absurd to do so; but we must concur in the Senate amendments or lose the bill.

Mr. CESSNA. Has the Senate added anything?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir. With the consent of the House, I will explain the matter. This bill as originally reported from the Committee on War Claims made appropriations covering eleven hundred and sixty-eight cases, the amount appropriated being $748,296.39. As reported by the commissioners of claims, their allowances were distributed among the twelve States over which the commissioners had jurisdiction, as follows:

Alabama	$71,671 82
Arkansas	96,501 00
Florida	13,475 00
Georgia	42,535 86
Louisiana	95,737 00
Mississippi	143,128 00
North Carolina	35,889 57
South Carolina	5,930 25
Tennessee	87,400 80
Texas	1,300 00
Virginia	138,145 42
West Virginia	8,695 00
Total	750,409 72

The claims reported as disallowed in said report numbered twelve hundred and forty-four, and involved the sum of $4,471,995.09. Many of these disallowed claims were reported as disallowed for want of jurisdiction, and necessitated examination of the same by the Committee on War Claims.

The third annual report of the commissioners embraced twenty-four hundred and sixty-five cases, of which number ten hundred and ninety-two were reported as allowed in whole or in part, and thirteen hundred and seventy-three as wholly disallowed.

The thirteen hundred and seventy-three disallowed cases remained on the files of the committee for examination, and many of these cases were examined in connection with the bill under consideration, many cases in that report being reported adversely for want of jurisdiction.

As the practice and proceedings of the commissioners in the examination of these cases is a proper subject of comment, it is equally proper to state that the cases are divided among the commissioners, who individually examine the cases allotted to them. The conclusion of each commissioner is reported to the board, who agree or disagree to the same, the report in each case being unanimous, no case being reported to Congress in which there is not the concurrence of every member of the board.

The cases allowed and disallowed are embraced in a schedule which is made a part of the report of the commissioners. This report is valueless as a basis of a bill without examination of the papers in each of the cases reported upon. The names are misspelled, the amounts allowed are often erroneous, and it requires a careful examination and comparison of all the papers to determine the amount that should be included in the bill. Every case reported allowed by the commissioners has been carefully examined by the clerk of the Committee on War Claims, the allowance compared with the items in the petition, and every computation carried out and verified and the proper amount placed in the bill. One hundred and thirty-three errors, mostly typographical, have been corrected; and every case where the amount allowed exceeded $2,000 was distributed to and examined by members of the committee.

The committee have accepted the awards of the commissioners in the main as conclusive. In all cases where the amount claimed exceeds $10,000 the evidence was taken in Washington before the commissioners, as required by section 3 of the act of March 3, 1871, creating the commissioners of claims. The committee were of opinion that the commissioners were better qualified to pass upon these claims in most respects than a committee of Congress.

The Committee on War Claims accepted these awards, carefully scrutinizing, however, each case where the award exceeded $2,000, it being found utterly impracticable to examine all the cases reported.

From the discussion when the first bill was reported in the second session of the Forty-second Congress it appears that the awards and findings of the commissioners were accepted as in the main conclusive.

When the first bill making appropriations for cases reported allowed by the commissioners of claims was reported to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Claims of the Forty-second Congress, Hon. Austin Blair, the following discussion occurred in answer to the interrogatory of Hon. Samuel Shellabarger, who inquired as to the rules adopted by the commissioners in the examination and allowance of claims reported upon favorably by the commissioners:

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. The gentleman will find in the report of the claims commission itself (which is Miscellaneous Document No. 16) a very full statement and discussion of that whole subject. They have acted upon the principle of allowing no claims except those due to loyal persons, and they have been exceedingly particular in requiring evidence upon that point.

By their report it appears that a very large number of claims had been ruled out entirely, upon the ground that the persons were not proved to be loyal. They are confined by the law to the allowance of "stores and supplies for the Army," and they have confined themselves strictly to that, rejecting all claims for damages or anything outside of what are recognized by the Army rules and regulations as "stores and supplies."

They have elaborated very much in their report what they construe that language to be, adopting the rules of the Army, and they have been very strict to follow it.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Then there is nothing in the bill for losses or destruction of property?

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. Nothing at all. They have carefully excluded everything for losses or destruction of property.

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. Is anything allowed in the nature of incidental damages?

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. There is nothing in the nature of damages?

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. Not at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have heard outside that claims have been presented for rent of buildings occupied by the Army. I desire to know if there is anything in this bill allowed for rent.

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. I will state to the gentleman, and I think he will find it stated in the report, that the commission in examining into that question looked into it very carefully to see whether they could allow for the occupation of buildings, but found that under Army operations the occupation of buildings is not regarded as "stores or supplies," but stands eo nomine as rent.

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. There is another class of claims which has been pushed upon the Government from time to time, and that is claims for the occupation of land. I know that in several instances in my own experience in the Army claims have been attempted to be fastened upon the Army for the use of fields for camping grounds. If claims of that kind were allowed, we might ultimately be compelled to pay rent for the battle-fields. I desire to ask if there is anything of that kind before the commission at all?

Mr. BLAIR, of Michigan. Nothing of that sort is allowed. On the contrary, all such claims were specially rejected. One member of the Committee on Claims will report a bill to pay such claims simply because they were rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe this commission to be a very fair and a very honest one. It is also very apparent that the House of Representatives cannot examine into all these cases; we must rely upon the report of the commission that has examined these cases, heard the evidence, and examined all the circumstances connected with those cases. We must do that, or else we shall be compelled to overthrow their report and have no sort of regard for it. For one I am inclined to regard the report of that commission as prima facie evidence of what should be done in the case.

The preparation of the bill to pay these awards, in connection with the examination of the fourteen hundred cases referred to the committee by the House, involved great clerical labor, necessitating the services of an additional clerk, who was detailed by the commissioners for that purpose to aid the committee. The clerk so detailed was entirely familiar with the cases in the report, and proved very efficient to the committee.

The bill was reported to the House on the 11th of February, the bill to pay awards in second annual report in the last session of the Forty-second Congress being reported February 8, passing the House on that date, and passing the Senate on the last day of the Congress.

It was not possible for the clerks to prepare the bill and insure accuracy to complete the bill any sooner than it was prepared in and reported by the Committee on War Claims.

This fact should be considered in connection with the consideration of this bill, and it is an answer to any adverse criticism as to delay of the Committee on War Claims in reporting this bill. After the bill was reported I made repeated efforts to get it finally acted on; but there was delay in the House which I could not control. In the RECORD of February 24, 1875, will be found a full and complete statement of the action of the committee on this bill.

There being no objection, the amendments were concurred in.

POSTAGE ON AGRICULTURAL NEWSPAPERS, ETC.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the rules be suspended to pass the joint resolution (H. R. No. 155) relative to postage on monthly newpapers relative to agricultural subjects and implements.

The resolution was read. It provides that hereafter the postage upon all monthly newspapers, whether published gratuitously or for a stated subscription price, when devoted to the interests of agriculture and the dissemination of knowledge relative to agricultural implements and subjects, shall be the same as upon regular monthly newspapers published on secular subjects.

The motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

FORT BRADY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. No. 757) to donate a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school-district No. 1, in township of Sault Sainte Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides that a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady, situate in the county of Chippewa, and State of Michigan, containing one and twenty-six hundreths acres, and bounded on the north by Portage street, on the east by Church street, on the south by Ridge street, and on the west by the west line of said military reservation, be, and the same is hereby, donated to school district No. 1, in township of Sault Sainte Marie, in the county and State aforesaid, for school purposes, and for no other purpose.

The second section provides that so much of Portage street, Church street, and Ridge street, in the village of Sault Sainte Marie, as is so represented upon a map of said village filed in the General Land Office, as shall embrace the portion of ground aforesaid, be established as such streets.

The rules were suspended and the bill passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 55) to authorize the purchase of a site for a public building at Topeka, Kansas;

An act (S. No. 271) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased;

An act (S. No. 907) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize lists;

An act (S. No. 1296) to authorize the acceptance in behalf of the United States of America of certain real property occupied by the United States consul at Tunis; and

An act (S. No. 1297) to provide for the republication of the first volume of the Patent Office Gazette.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to submit a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses the following:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 9, 13, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 34, 35, 43, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 56, 65, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 80, 83, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 93, 112, 113, and 115.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 8, 15, 21, 31, 44, 53, 57, 60, 66, 82, 85, 97, 98, 100, 102, 103, 106, 107, 108, 109, 114, 119, and 122; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "and" where it occurs in line 26, page 3 of the bill, and insert after the word "refuge" in line 27, same page, "and sites for beacons;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out after the word "purposes" in line 3 down to and including the word "thousand" in line 4, and inserting in lieu thereof "185,000;" and striking out all of the proviso down to and including the word "specified" in line 18 of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the word "claims" in said amendment insert "of the Senate;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Substitute for the word "seventy-five" the word "sixty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same by inserting after the words "Yerba Buena" the word "island;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 40, with an amendment substituting for the words proposed to be stricken out the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a careful examination to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether any person, firm, or corporation is now occupying any larger portion of the land known as the Rancho Panoche Grande than is authorized and allowed by the laws relating to mining lands, and that he make a full and detailed report of such examination to Congress at the beginning of the next session; and to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect this provision, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 42, and agree to the same by substituting for the words proposed to be inserted the words "seventy-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the word "forty" for "twenty" in said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from so much of its amendment as strikes out section 2 of the bill, with an amendment striking out all after the word "dollars" in lines 57 to 73 of the bill down to and including the word "six," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "two chiefs of divisions, at $2,400 each; two clerks of class four; five clerks of class three;" and the House agree to the same as so modified.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 124, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the word "copies" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one copy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

AARON A. SARGENT,
STEPHEN W. DORSEY,
JAMES K. KELLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there are any inquiries any gentlemen desire to make in regard to this report I will listen to them. I believe my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] desires three minutes. I yield him that time.

Mr. TODD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio what is the report of the committee in regard to the payment of contested-election expenses?

Mr. GARFIELD. Very unfortunately, as I think, they all go in.

Mr. RANDALL. Not having been willing to sign the report of the conference committee, it is due to the House and due perhaps to the country, that I should say why I consider this bill, aggregating the amount of $37,000,000, as utterly unjustifiable in the present condition of the finances of the Government and the present condition of the business of the country. And not only do I protest against the aggregate amount appropriated, but there are all through this bill appropriations for objects, to use a mild term, which may be characterized as of the most doubtful propriety. In addition to this general opposition which I have to the bill, I think that in another respect this committee has utterly failed to give in the report that decision which the large majority of this House had a right to expect in reference to the amendment relating to the New Idria Company and the Government ownership of that land. The provision which has been inserted is to my mind a mere sham, and calculated rather to retard the interest of the Government in repossessing that land now held in excess of every right, legal and moral, on the part of that company. These, Mr. Speaker, are the reasons which prompted me in refusing to give my sanction to any such extravagant and outrageous appropriation bill at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. I will.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should like to inquire what precisely is the provision to which the gentleman has referred? If I understand it, it is this: The $5,000 are appropriated which the House desired. But it is only to have the Secretary of the Interior inquire whether there is anybody on that land claiming it and to report to some other Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. The next Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not to bring any suit?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not to substantiate the title of the United States?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know but this is the last time I shall ever address any public assembly. But if it was my last word anywhere and everywhere I should protest against this neglect to carry out the voice and vote of the House three times over expressed, once by vote of 138 to 5, that the Government should reclaim this great piece of property that is withheld from them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say only a very few words in regard to this bill. There were only some seventy-five amendments pending here as differences between the Senate and House, and the Senate receded absolutely on forty-one; the House receded absolutely on twenty-three; on all the others there was a mutual concession and agreement in each case. In many cases, in most cases, the amounts appropriated have been cut down. I do not think the bill largely, if at all, exceeds in amount what it appropriated when it left the House. I shall be surprised if the amount is not found to be smaller. On every great substantial question of importance the will of the House was fairly realized. We have had far more than our share in number and amount and importance of items in the adjustment between the Senate and House.

My colleague says he thinks there are too large appropriations here, appropriations which cannot be defended. I think when an analysis of this bill comes to be made he will find it difficult to point out the extravagance to which he refers. There are some things which I think are extravagant. I greatly regret that we have violated the old rule in regard to the payments of parties to contested elections, allowing a large number to come in, and opening the door to a future bad practice.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman how this amendment of the House, appropriating nearly $30,000 for expenses of election cases, was agreed to by the committee after the Senate had struck it out?

Mr. GARFIELD. It was struck out, but the Senate yielded under the pressure of our House. The only special point that has been noticed is in regard to the Rancho Panoche Grande. On that subject, though, I was very decided in my opinion that this had no business in an appropriation bill, yet I felt it was my duty to be loyal to the House and insist that, if possible, the Senate should concede what was the will of the House. We had reason to believe, indeed we were told by the conferees on the part of the House, that not three Senators were willing to support that; that they were utterly and irreconcilably opposed to it; and in that view of the case we inquired of our associate conferee what was the point to be reached, and as nearly as we could ascertain it was this: that so far as it had any public bearing whatever, it was claimed that some people had obtained possession of and were operating a larger portion of that ranch than they were entitled to under the mining law. So far as that allegation went it was indeed a public matter, and to meet that view we thought we would proceed on the principle of hearing first and striking afterwards; and we therefore propose that the Secretary of the Interior shall examine and report whether this allegation were true, and we gave him $5,000 to conduct the examination. That done, it is to be laid before the next Congress. I will say only in conclusion that I do not believe that this squabble between private interests ought ever to have been put on an appropriation bill. I demand the previous question.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the restriction in regard to public buildings is retained?

Mr. GARFIELD. The general restriction is retained, but the special restrictions were not retained.

The question was put, and the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the deficiency bill. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I demand the previous question on the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of the late Commodore Melancthon B. Woolsey, of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 4774) granting a pension to Mary Ann McDonald;

A bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register;

A bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure Assistant Paymaster-General;

A bill (H. R. No. 965) granting a pension to Samuel Purcell;

A bill (H. R. No. 4775) granting a pension to Margaret Pattison;

A bill (H. R. No. 4754) granting a pension to Betsy A. Eaton;

A bill (H. R. No. 4777) granting a pension to James A. Forgey;

A bill (H. R. No. 4800) granting a pension to John H. Looby;

A bill (H. R. No. 4458) relating to a site for a public building at Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey;

A bill (H. R. No. 3718) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Arthur;

A bill (H. R. No. 1606) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Weatherlow;

A bill (H. R. No. 3713) granting a pension to Sarah S. Cooper;

A bill (H. R. No. 4329) granting a pension to William H. Small;

A bill (H. R. No. 4776) granting a pension to Elizabeth Lanning;

A bill (H. R. No. 4763) granting a pension to Lafayette Briggs;

A bill (H. R. No. 4767) for the relief of Ferdinand Monti;

A bill (H. R. No. 4755) granting a pension to William Lyon; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3341) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

D. R. HAGGARD.

Mr. BECK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and pass the bill (S. No. 831) for the relief of D. R. Haggard.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to D. R. Haggard, late colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000, in full compensation and satisfaction of his claim against the Government of the United States for quartermaster and commissary stores taken from his farm, near Burksville, Kentucky, by United States forces during the war of the rebellion, and used by them.

No objection being made, the bill received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

On motion of Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 4528) amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, at Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri," was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendments of the Senate thereto were concurred in.

BOUNDARY LINE OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent to have the House consider and pass at this time Senate bill No. 679, to establish the boundary line between the State of Arkansas and the Indian country.

The first section declares that the boundary line between Arkansas and the Indian country, as originally surveyed and marked, and upon which the lines of the survey of the public lands in the State of Arkansas were closed up, shall be the permanent boundary line between Arkansas and the Indian country.

The second section directs the Secretary of the Interior, as soon as practicable, to cause the boundary line as fixed in the foregoing section to be retraced and marked in a distinct and permanent manner, and provides that if the original line, when retraced, shall be found to differ in any respect from what the boundary line would be if run in accordance with the provisions of the treaties establishing the eastern boundary line of the Choctaw and Cherokee Nations, then the surveyor shall note such variations and compute the area of the land which in that case would be taken from the State of Arkansas or the Indian country, as the case may be; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be obliterated any monuments set up in any former surveys indicating any line at variance with the surveys provided for in this act.

No objection being made, the bill was passed.

INLAND AND SEA-BOARD COASTING COMPANY.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the House to concur in the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 2179, to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia.

No objection was made.

PAY OF CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STANARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee on Commerce be allowed the same compensation for his services as the clerk of the Committee on Accounts for such time as his services are necessary, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund to the clerk of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service the usual rate of compensation to clerks of committees for the present session of Congress; and to the messenger of the Committee on War Claims the sum of $200, for services rendered the committee during the present session.

Mr. DUELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings and the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department have leave for the employment of a clerk jointly during the present session of Congress, at the usual rate of compensation; and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to pay the clerk of said committees his salary from the commencement of this session.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4573) to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, were taken from the Speaker's table, read, and concurred in.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 917) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the county of Chatham, State of Georgia, was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, the bill S. No. 1260) to remove the political disabilities of James M. Quarles, of Nashville, Tennessee, was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

LYDIA CRUGER.

On motion of Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4839) for the relief of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Sheppard, deceased, was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:
That the claim heretofore reported to Congress by the Court of Claims in favor of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Sheppard, deceased, be referred back to the said court, with power to hear and determine the same as in other cases, and with the right to either party to use the evidence heretofore taken in said cause so far as the said court shall deem the same pertinent and competent.

The amendment was concurred in.

MILITARY BOUNTY-LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 763) to exempt military bounty-land warrants and the lands obtained thereby from sale, &c., be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The bill was read. It provides that all military bounty-land warrants granted, or to be granted, under and pursuant to any act of Congress to officers, musicians, and privates, whether of regulars, rangers, or militia, and to the officers, seamen, flotilla-men, clerks, and landsmen in the Navy, or to other persons enumerated in any such act, for services in any of the wars in which this country has been engaged since 1790, and the lands obtained by such warrants, shall be exempt from payment of any debt or liability incurred by such officers, soldiers, seamen, or other persons named in the warrants prior to the issuing of the patents for such lands.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO PENSION BILLS.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, Senate amendments to bills of the following titles were read and concurred in:

An act (H. R. No. 1054) granting a pension to Jefferson W. Davis; and

An act (H. R. No. 4786) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah B. Howe and Mrs. Mary Cranston.

OSCEOLA C. GREEN.

Mr. FORT. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. No. 629) for the relief of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest, of the Maryland Line of the Army of the Revolution, for the half-pay for life due to the said Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest under the resolve of October 21, 1780, from the end of the revolutionary war to the time of his death, July 8, 1805.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Has this bill been considered by any committee?

Mr. FORT. By the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do they report favorably?

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will not inaugurate the policy of passing this class of bills. These claims have long since been regarded as barred by the policy of this Government.

Mr. FORT. The bill has been examined by the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Here is a claim more than seventy-five years old. Three generations have passed since the occurrence of the events on which it is founded.

The motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to, there being—ayes 41, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

DANIEL H. KELLEY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move to suspend the rules and put on its passage the bill (S. No. 841) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelley upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to place the name of Daniel H. Kelley, deceased, on the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry, to date December 1, 1861.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was passed.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. HYNES. I ask, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 1096) amendatory of the act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas."

The bill, which was read, provides that the act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas," passed in the year 1870, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that the taking of an appeal, as provided in said act, shall in no manner supersede the action, authority, or power of the receiver provided for in said act.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Has that bill been before any committee of this House?

Mr. HYNES. I am sure if the gentleman listened to the bill there can be no objection to its passage.

Objection was made.

Mr. HYNES. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The House refused to suspend the rules, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

ROBERT W. JOHNSON, FORMERLY OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 1331) to remove the political disabilities of Robert W. Johnson, formerly of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in it but provision removing the political disabilities of Robert W. Johnson, formerly of Arkansas.

Mr. RAINEY. Does a petition accompany the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands one did accompany the bill in the Senate, from which this comes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

THOMAS F. FAUNTLEROY.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas F. Fauntleroy and Charles H. Williamson, citizens of Virginia.

The amendments of the Senate were to strike out "Charles H. Williamson" and to amend the title so it will read, "An act to remove the political disabilities of Thomas F. Fauntleroy, of Virginia.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

DISTRICT COURTS OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the bill (S. No. 88) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

Mr. SENER. I object.

Mr. COX. I also object to that bill, because it establishes a new judicial district in Louisiana.

Mr. SPEER. It establishes another set of judicial officers. It creates a new judicial district in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I will state what there is in the bill. It provides for the creation of a new judicial district in Louisiana; for a judge at a salary of $3,500, and for a marshal and a clerk. That is all there is in the bill. The same bill passed the House in the Forty-second Congress and has been approved by the Committee on the Judiciary of the present Congress. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

The House refused to suspend the rules and pass the bill, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be appointed a committee of three members, to join such committee of the Senate as they may appoint to wait on the President of the United States and inform him if he has no further communication to make the two Houses are ready to adjourn.

The resolution was adopted.

EMPLOYÉS OF HALL FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to the two employés of the hall folding-room their pay for the month of March.

Mr. RANDALL. These are two pages omitted in the resolution passed yesterday, and all ought to fare alike. They are the two lads who attend the hall folding-room.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4528) amendatory of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri;"

An act (H. R. No. 2101) for the relief of the owners of the steamer Clara Dolsen;

An act (H. R. No. 4790) granting a pension to David Saulsbury;

An act (H. R. No. 4764) granting a pension to Sarah A. Woodruff;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) authorizing the acceptance by Captain E. H. Wells of the United States Navy of the cross of the Legion of Honor conferred on him by the President of the French Republic;

An act (H. R. No. 3683) granting a pension to Melissa Rankin;

An act (H. R. No. 4746) authorizing the Second National Bank of Watkins, New York, and the Slater National Bank of North Providence, Rhode Island, to change their names;

An act (H. R. No. 2794) granting a pension to Elizabeth Wolf;

An act (H. R. No. 3362) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah B. Forest, widow of Lieutenant Dulaney N. Forest, late of the United States Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 3720) granting a pension to Charles C. Haight;

An act (H. R. No. 4449) to amend an act entitled "An act to revive with amendments an act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," approved July 7, 1838;

An act (H. R. No. 4729) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 4782) granting a pension to Ansel Thayer, of Braintree, Massachusetts;

An act (H. R. No. 4866) for the relief of Major N. H. McLean, late of the Adjutant-General's Department, United States Army;

An act (H. R. No. 3641) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company;"

An act (H. R. No. 4692) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioner of claims under act of Congress March 31, 1871;

An act (H. R. No. 1606) granting increase of pension to Steven Weatherloe; and

An act (H. R. No. 3021) granting pensions to the widows, children, dependent mothers and fathers, and the orphan brothers and sisters of those soldiers who were murdered by guerrillas in Centralia, Missouri, in 1864.

OWNERS OF THE BRIG MARGARETTA.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta or their legal representatives be now passed.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta or their legal representatives the sum of $1,378.75, the same being the amount paid by Robert Murray, jr., as discriminating tonnage dues upon the Haytian brig Margaretta in the years 1867 and 1868, in contravention of the treaty then existing between the United States and the republic of Hayti.

There was no objection; and the bill, by unanimous consent, was passed.

WILLIS N. ARNOLD.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 574) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Willis N. Arnold, of Henderson County, Tennessee, the sum of $6,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, it being the amount collected by the military authorities for his benefit and paid by them into the United States Treasury.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. This bill for the relief of Willis N. Arnold is reported from the Committee on War Claims. It has been examined by the Committee on War Claims, and I was authorized to report from the committee with the recommendation that it do pass. It is precisely like the bill which has already been passed and approved by the President for the relief of John Aldredge, of Henderson Station, Tennessee. I present to the House the following statement from the War Department, which contains all the information necessary on the subject of this bill when taken in connection with the report on the claim of John Aldredge:

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1871.

SIR: With reference to the claim of W. N. Arnold and others, for cotton destroyed at Henderson Station, Tennessee, by rebel troops—referred to this office November 20, 1871, for report as to the liability of the Government for payment of these claims, having reference to the statement of claimants that the cotton was seized while in transit to Memphis and used for breastworks and fortifications, and while in possession of the United States the cotton was captured and destroyed by rebels, &c.—I have the honor to report:

As regards the question on which the opinion of the Quartermaster-General is called for, that is liability of the United States for the cotton, I find that the cotton is alleged to have been taken possession of and placed in breastworks for defense of the post of Henderson Station and to have been destroyed by the enemy when the garrison was captured by the rebel forces.

I think that the United States is not liable for the destruction by an enemy of property thus temporarily used. The cotton piled in breastworks cannot be held as actually appropriated to the use of the United States. Like any other bulky packages which could be left out of doors and used in case of danger as a shelter from behind which to fire at an enemy, it would, had it been successfully defended, have been ultimately restored to owners. The cotton does not appear to have been confiscated, seized as forfeited, or appropriated to the United States.

By law and general orders relating to captured and abandoned property all property coming into possession of the Army was to be reported, and unless needed for military uses was to be finally turned over to the Treasury agents, charged with such expense of transportation as had been incurred by the Quartermaster's Department, but no officer of the Army had authority to pay for such property.

Cotton used for breastworks is not quartermasters' stores. The proper material for breastworks is earth, with sod or wood revetment; and the provision of material for this purpose belongs to the Engineer Department, and cannot be paid for by the Quartermaster-General as quartermaster stores under the law of 4th July, 1864.

The destruction was the act of the enemy. The United States lost largely while guarding this property, and I do not see that the United States became liable for its destruction by using the property itself as a means of protection while defending it.

General Grant, then commanding, ordered a war levy upon neighboring rebels, and the full value of the United States property and of the cotton—private property—destroyed appears to have been collected. Colonel Hillyer states that the money thus collected exceeded the amount which General Grant had intended to have collected, and that General Grant refused to permit it to be applied to payment of private losses and damages.

Part of the contribution or levy appears to have gone into the military railroad department, being that which represented the value of public property destroyed. Part of the remainder, namely, $30,000, went into the hands of the quartermaster, Colonel C. A. Reynolds, as appears from his accounts on file at the Treasury.

In settling the accounts of officers of this Department at the Treasury, all these military collections, levies, rents of abandoned or captured buildings, &c., are, if their proceeds have been used in the operations of the Quartermaster's Department, charged against the regular appropriation of the Quartermaster's Department, and the amount is placed in the Treasury by transfer warrant to credit of these irregular funds.

While it was within the military authority and power of a general in the field to levy and collect moneys as fines, and while he might have paid the proceeds to those who had been injured by the enemy, it appears that General Grant refused to do this; and I know of no law by which any officer of the United States can now take this money from the Treasury and apply it to payment of these losses and damages.

I am of opinion that the parties have no claim in law, and no officer, so far as I know, has power to relieve them.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. C. MEIGS,
Quartermaster-General, Brevet Major-General United States Army.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Approved.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

APRIL 26, 1872.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, the Speaker declared that on the division by sound two-thirds had not in the opinion of the Chair voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LEWIS. I call for a division. This is the same as the Aldredge bill which we passed the other day.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 85.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a statement to the House. There are various documents which have been received from the Executive Departments, upon which it is of course too late to act during this Congress. There are some of them of considerable importance which ought to be printed. The Chair asks that he be allowed to direct their printing, with the proper references, so that they may be on the files of the next Congress merely as printed documents.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask in the same connection that some reports which the Committee on Appropriations have made on various subjects be printed.

The SPEAKER. That privilege was given yesterday under a suspension of the rules.

ANGUS DEAN.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Angus Dean, of Clark County, Indiana, in regard to the subject of jettees; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DELEGATES OF CHEROKEE NATION.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the delegates of the Cherokee Nation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to present a bill to pay the telegraph operators of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the telegraph operators of the House and Senate from July 1, 1875, to December 1, 1875, of which $500 shall be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the House operator, and the sum of $500 shall be paid by the Secretary of the Senate to the Senate operator.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 4869) was read three times, and passed.

SALE OF LANDS AT VINCENNES, INDIANA.

On motion of Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3339) authorizing the sale of certain lands at Vincennes, Indiana, with Senate amendments, was taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendments were concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution and bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 102) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlain; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2419) to provide for the construction of military roads in Arizona.

THANKS TO THE OFFICERS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to offer the following resolution, which I hope will be unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the House are due and are hereby tendered to the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, Postmaster, and other subordinate officers of the House for the courtesy, efficiency, and fidelity with which they have discharged the duties of their several offices.

Mr. COX. I move to insert the word "Chaplain."

Mr. DAWES. I must object, and I object only because this thing seems to be traveling beyond all precedent.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair names as the committee to wait on the President of the United States Mr. DAWES, Mr. MAYNARD, and Mr. COX.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 831) for the relief of D. R. Haggard;

A bill (S. No. 976) to promote economy and efficiency in the marine-hospital service;

A bill (S. No. 324) for the relief of M. Von Entress Fuersteneck, late second-lieutenant of the Sixty-eighth New York Volunteers;

A bill (S. No. 757) to donate a certain portion of the military reservation of Fort Brady to school district No. 1, in township of Sault Ste. Marie, and State of Michigan, for school purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4851) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes.

GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. DONNAN. I call up the concurrent resolution of the House in relation to the printing of the geological and geographical survey of the Territories, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the printing of the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories for the year 1874, with the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out the words "one thousand" and insert the words "five hundred."

Mr. DONNAN. I will say that the amendment of the Senate simply reduces the number. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Senate resolution is in the form originally reported by the Committee on Printing. The amendment of the Senate contemplates the printing of four thousand copies of Professor Hayden's report, two thousand five hundred copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, one thousand copies for the use of the Senate, and five hundred copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

ADMISSION OF LADIES TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. PACKARD. Before that motion is put, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House that during the few remaining moments of the session ladies may be admitted to the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KASSON. On condition that no more bills are to be acted on.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Iowa objects.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4839) for the relief of Lydia Cruger, executrix of Moses Sheppard, deceased;

A bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas T. Fountleroy and Charles H. Williamson, citizens of Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 4814) to relieve James M. Hawes, of Covington, Kentucky, of all political disabilities; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3891) relieving the political disabilities of Edward Booker, of Henry County, Virginia.

ADMISSION OF LADIES TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. PACKARD. I renew my request that for the remainder of the session ladies may be admitted on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. HYNES. I again ask unanimous consent for the passage of the bill (S. No. 1096) amendatory of the act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to the passage of a bill of that character at this late stage of the session.

Mr. HYNES. I move, then, to suspend the rules and pass the bill. I ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] may give an explanation of the bill, as he understands the facts.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. This question has never been considered by the appropriate committee, the Committee on Private Land Claims, and I do not see why it should be passed at this last hour of the session without proper consideration.

Mr. HYNES. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I do not care if it is a Senate bill.

Mr. HYNES. It is simply that the revenues may be put into the possession of the Government.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and upon a division there were ayes 62, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

ALMON BARNES.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent for the House now to consider and pass House bill No. 815, for the relief of Almon Barnes.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. That bill is right. It has been examined by the Committee on War Claims and found to be correct.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

PAY OF CLERK OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States pay out of the contingent fund to the clerk of the Committees on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 and of Coinage, Weights, and Measures his salary from the beginning of the second session of the Forty-third Congress, he having rendered the services for such period, and no other person having been paid for the same.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Unanimous consent was asked and obtained for the withdrawal of papers in the following cases:

By Mr. MYERS: In the case of E. Brady.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the joint committee of the two Houses charged with the duty of informing the President that the two Houses were in readiness to adjourn, and inquiring whether he had any further communication to make to their respective branches, have attended to that duty and have been requested by him to report that he has no further communication to make.

VALEDICTORY ADDRESS OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. GENTLEMEN: I close with this hour a six years' service as Speaker of the House of Representatives—a period surpassed in length by but two of my predecessors, and equaled by only two others. The rapid mutations of personal and political fortune in this country have limited the great majority of those who have occupied this chair to shorter terms of office.

It would be the gravest insensibility to the honors and responsibilities of life not to be deeply touched by so signal a mark of public esteem as that which I have thrice received at the hands of my political associates. I desire in this last moment to renew to them, one and all, my thanks and my gratitude.

To those from whom I differ in my party relations—the minority of this House—I tender my acknowledgments for the generous courtesy with which they have treated me. By one of those sudden and decisive changes which distinguish popular institutions, and which conspicuously mark a free people, that minority is transformed in the ensuing Congress to the governing power of the House. However it might possibly have been under other circumstances, that event necessarily renders these words my farewell to the Chair.

The Speakership of the American House of Representatives is a post of honor, of dignity, of power, of responsibility. Its duties are at once complex and continuous: they are both onerous and delicate: they are performed in the broad light of day, under the eye of the whole people, subject at all times to the closest observation, and always attended with the sharpest criticism. I think no other official is held to such instant and such rigid accountability. Parliamentary rulings in their very nature are peremptory: almost absolute in authority and instantaneous in effect. They cannot always be enforced in such a way as to win applause or secure popularity; but I am sure that no man of any party who is worthy to fill this chair will ever see a dividing line between duty and policy.

Thanking you once more, and thanking you most cordially, for the honorable testimonial you have placed on record to my credit, I perform my only remaining duty in declaring that the Forty-third Congress has reached its constitutional limit, and that the House of Representatives stands adjourned without day. [Earnest and prolonged applause in all parts of the Hall.]

APPENDIX.

APPENDIX

TO THE

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Use of the Army in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. OLIVER P. MORTON,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

January 8, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolution submitted by Mr. THURMAN:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any portion of the Army of the United States, or any officer or officers, soldier or soldiers of such Army, did in any manner interfere or intermeddle with, control or seek to control, the organization of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana or either branch thereof on the 4th instant; and especially whether any person or persons claiming seats in either branch of said Legislature have been deprived thereof, or prevented from taking the same, by any such military force, officer, or soldier; and if such has been the case, then that the President inform the Senate by what authority such military intervention and interference have taken place;"

And Mr. CONKLING having moved to amend by inserting after the word "Senate" the words "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests"—

Mr. MORTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] thinks that the amendment I offered is not germane to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The resolution of the Senator from Ohio, when I heard it read, seemed to be a specific inquiry, designed to confine the answer of the President to a particular point, while excluding the body of the information necessary to enable us to understand the whole question; and it was with a view of getting at that body of facts, without which we cannot correctly understand any answer that might be made to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, that I offered my amendment; and I ask the Secretary now to read my amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is at the end of the resolution to insert—

And whether he has any information in regard to the existence of armed organizations in the State of Louisiana hostile to the government of the State and intent on overturning such government by force.

Mr. MORTON. Now, suppose it should turn out, and the President should so inform us, that there is an armed organization in the State of Louisiana hostile to the government of the State, and indirectly but substantially equally hostile to the Government of the United States; that that organization is in full force to-day in the city of New Orleans and throughout the State of Louisiana; suppose he should inform us, as an evidence of the purpose of that organization, that on the 14th day of September last it suddenly arose, exerted its power, and overthrew the State government of Louisiana at the cost of seventy-five men killed on the streets at once and perhaps more than that number wounded; that that armed organization is now existing, was existing on last Monday, and on that day was surrounding the Legislature, perhaps not present and visible, but within reach of their arms; that that armed organization did successfully overturn by bloodshed and murder the government of the State of Louisiana on the 14th of September; that its purpose is not changed; that it is there now, and that upon the withdrawal of the forces of the United States the same scenes would be renewed, the State government assaulted and overturned, and men murdered who might stand up in defense of it—I ask if these facts have no pertinence to the question involved?

It occurs to me that they go to the very point of it; they go to the substance of the whole transaction. Suppose the President should answer that he was called upon on the night of the 14th of September to protect the State government of Louisiana, and was compelled to send his forces there, and when they got there the white-leaguers who had committed these murders suddenly dispersed to their homes and their holes in the city of New Orleans and could not be found, and all was for the moment quiet, but that he has information which leads him to believe that the very moment the United States forces are withdrawn, these armed mercenaries, or, to use the language of General Sheridan—I apprehend he is not very far wrong in it—these armed banditti would immediately come forth and repeat their violence; I ask if that fact would have no pertinence to the presence of the Army in New Orleans on that day?

Suppose he should further answer that the inauguration of a spurious and usurping Legislature, having no lawful title to their seats, no evidence of their election, was a part of this whole conspiracy intended to overturn the lawful State government of Louisiana; I would ask if that information would have no pertinency to the resolution presented by the Senator from Ohio? It seems to me that it would. Suppose the President should go further and say, "I have evidence that this armed organization exists not only in the city of New Orleans and in every parish of Louisiana, but that it exists in the State of Alabama, in the State of Mississippi, in the State of Arkansas; that it is a combination running through a number of States, quietly organized under false pretenses, thoroughly armed, ready to spring into action at any moment;" suppose the President should give us that information; I ask if it is not important to the people of the United States? Everybody would at once inquire, What is the meaning and the purpose of this armed organization extending through so many States? What is the purpose of it? Is it simply to overturn the State government in Louisiana? Is that the end of it? Why, sir, that is only the beginning of it in Louisiana. Is it to overturn the State government in Mississippi? That is only the beginning of it there. Only recently we had this same armed organization in the city of Vicksburgh; and the newspapers stated—I saw it, I think, in the Vicksburgh Herald, a democratic paper—that on the next day after they had murdered in cold blood some seventy-five colored men, over five hundred men from Louisiana, white-leagures of Louisiana, armed, equipped, and in military order and uniform, were landed off the steamboat in the city of Vicksburgh. They had come up as volunteers to offer their services, and they marched up and down through the streets of that city. Is there no significance in a fact like that?

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend tell the Senate why they went there; why there was disturbance there?

Mr. MORTON. I expect they went there to aid in the further slaughter of colored men, if it was necessary. I expect they went there to aid in just such a purpose as had been executed there before to the death of some seventy-five men. I expect they went there for the same purpose with which at Coushatta they murdered a number of men in cold blood in violation of a solemn agreement. I expect they went there for the same purpose with which they appeared upon the streets of New Orleans upon the 14th of September. I expect they went there for the same purpose with which they surrounded the court-house in the little town of Colfax, in the parish of Grant, and slaughtered, under circumstances of unequaled atrocity, nearly one hundred negroes only a few months ago. I expect they went there to accomplish the same thing that was accomplished at Trenton, Tennessee, and at various other places that I have not now the time to repeat. I presume they went there for this one purpose; and if the President has information of this kind, it is very pertinent to this inquiry and it is pertinent to the whole question. If the President should say to us in his response, "I was called upon on the 14th of September to send troops to New Orleans to prevent further murders and slaughters; I have not yet withdrawn that defense; the time has not come when I could safely withdraw those forces; and those troops were still there on the 5th day of January to accomplish a like purpose and to uphold the lawful government of the State of Louisiana and to protect people of every kind and of every quality in their lives and in their property," would it not be proper that he should have a chance to do so?

Now, sir, one word in regard to General Phil Sheridan. I do not think he requires any defense before the country or before the Senate.

He went to New Orleans, and he sent back here a dispatch which I have on my desk. I will not undertake to say that he wrote as a lawyer would write; I will not undertake to say that he is as good a lawyer as some of those who have assailed him. While some of them were studying law and learning how to argue, Phil was in the field putting down the enemies of his country and fighting to preserve the Union. I suppose he wrote just as an honest man would write going down there who was not a lawyer. He wrote just as he felt and just as he believed. He said:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large.

It seems to me that no man who has eyes to read or ears to hear can doubt the general truth of that statement. Where is the man who can deny the general truth of the statement that there is an insecurity of life in that State which we who are living in peace and safety cannot comprehend? How many people must be murdered in order to enable you to say there is insecurity of life? My friend from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] yesterday seemed to think that all would have to be killed before he could say that. "Why," said he, "there is Kellogg, he has not been murdered yet; and there is the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] he has not been killed yet; and there are a good many republicans down there who have not been killed. Why, then, are you talking about there being insecurity of life and property!" Sir, there have been more men killed in Louisiana for political offenses since 1866, coming down to 1874, than have been killed in all the Indian wars in this country for the last twenty years. As a matter of fact and figures, I presume it can be shown that more men have been murdered in Louisiana on account of their color and politics—beginning with the massacre in New Orleans in 1866—than have fallen in all your Indian wars in the last twenty years. If half a dozen men were killed by a foreign power we would all say, "That is cause of war; let us fly to arms." Why, sir, when a Spanish vessel captured the Virginius, and took from her some fifty-three or fifty-four people who claimed to be Americans, who were going upon an unlawful enterprise, as everybody knows—going to make war upon a government with which we were at peace—we all said that they were fellow-citizens, and we demanded apology for their murder and the surrender of those who had not been killed; and if it had not been made we should have gone to war with Spain. But men can be murdered, American citizens, in different parts of the United States, by the score and by the hundred, and it is not only no cause of war, but it is not exactly right to speak about it in the Senate of the United States; or, if you do, you are engaged in "the outrage business!" My friend complained yesterday that there had been so much said about these murders, these outrages, and I asked him which was the outrage, committing the murders or speaking about them. My friend, I think went a little off his feet when he said that both were outrages. He was willing to admit, and I was glad of that from his stand-point, that these numerous murders were an outrage, but he coupled with them another outrage, the telling about them. It is not respectable, he thinks, to tell about them. These things are not to be talked about in genteel society. If a constable is guilty of defalcation, or a sheriff, you may talk about that; but although men may be murdered by the hundred and by the thousand, it is not proper to talk about such things! It stirs up bad blood; it does not encourage fraternity. We ought to ignore murder; throw dirt over the graves and over the pools of blood; shut them out from view and proceed to other considerations! I do not like to talk about murder more than anybody else, but when murder becomes a part of a political system for the purpose of gaining political power, then I think we have a right to talk about it. When there is a regular plan to seize the State government of Louisiana by murder, by terrorism, and the State government of Mississippi—for the work has just begun there; they intend to capture Mississippi, county by county, just as they have captured the county of Warren, where with an acknowledged republican majority of 3,500 there is a reign of terror under which one hundred republicans to-morrow would not dare to cast their votes in that county—it looks very much like what I have just stated.

I think the President of the United States perhaps may take the same view of it, though I have not talked to him about it. It looks to me as if there was a concerted plan to break down the republican party in every Southern State where it has an acknowledged majority and exterminate the party by means of intimidation and terror, and that terror can only be created first by murder. Murder is the instrumentality by which this terror is to be raised up, by which the party is to be exterminated in those States, and then our political antagonists will have the South solid, every Southern State to begin with, and all they have to do then is to get two or three Northern States and they will certainly carry the next presidental election. I say it looks to me very much as if that was the plan.

But, sir, it has been said that I have accused the whole southern people of being murderers. The Senator from Georgia fell into that mistake. I have said no such thing. Thank God I do not believe it. I have said, however, and I repeat it, that the men who commit these murders are murderers; the men who aid and abet them are murderers; the men who connive at them and are willing to divide the garments of the slain, and those who may come in afterward and attempt to palliate or to cover up those crimes, if there be such persons, must properly be pronounced accessories after the fact. O, no; I believe there is a vast body of people in the South, democrats as well as republicans, who are opposed to these murders; but there is this great misfortune attaching to it, that the men who are opposed to these murders in the democratic party are silent, they are overawed, they dare not assert themselves. They could stop this stream of murder; they could dam it up in a day if they would but speak out; but if they attempt to speak, they know very well they will come under the condemnation and perhaps the punishment of this gang that have disgraced the South and are now making it slippery with blood. Therefore they are hushed. My friends come here from the South, gentlemen in whose society we take great pleasure and to whose speeches we listen with pleasure, and they often utter sentiments which give me great pleasure, but I know that the operation of those sentiments is principally confined to this Chamber whatever may be their feeling——

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator means to say that I utter sentiments here which I do not utter in Georgia, or that I would utter sentiments in Faneuil Hall in Massachusetts that I would not utter in Georgia, he gives expression to a libel against my character, sir.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I did not say that. I said the operation of these sentiments was principally confined to this Chamber; and can that be denied? I ask if their operation has not been chiefly confined to this Chamber? Ah! there is a dark current running through the State of my friend——

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me to answer that? I have proclaimed the same sentiments in my State ever since the war that I have proclaimed in this Chamber. I do it habitually.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator may have proclaimed them; I do not say he has not; I have not said that the Senator from Georgia has not proclaimed them; but I tell you they are not operating.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me, I tell him that they have operated in Georgia and are operating.

Mr. SCOTT. With the consent of the Senator from Indiana, I will revert far enough away from my purpose not to interfere in this part of the debate, to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina, which I think it due to justice and to history I should ask. The statement is made that the operation of these sentiments does go further than in this Chamber. I will refer him to the testimony of a gentleman named Schenk or Shenk—David, I think, is his first name—a member of the bar of North Carolina, who testified that he was a member of the Ku-Klux organization; that he joined it with the belief that it would not commit violence; that when he found they were proceeding to commit violence and murder he endeavored to restrain them, but did not succeed; that he was afraid to denounce them in his own State for fear that his own life would pay the penalty. I now ask the Senator from North Carolina if that gentleman has not since been elected the judge of one of the judicial circuits of North Carolina and is not now occupying that position?

Mr. MERRIMON. He is; and there is not a more quiet district in the United States than his, where law prevails more universally; and there republicans and democrats, black men and white men, alike enjoy their rights. There is absolutely peace and quiet there, and absolute satisfaction, and such is the announcement of the governor of the State in his late message to the Legislature of North Carolina, and a republican governor at that.

Mr. SCOTT. One question further. We have got a little away from authentic history. Let me ask, for I am informed that it is part of the current history of that State, whether that man who thus testified that he was a member of that organization, and who is now administering justice in one of the highest courts of North Carolina, has not since that time, in the streets of one of the towns of his circuit, shot down a negro, and whether he has ever been brought to trial for that offense?

Mr. MERRIMON. In the first place, it is not true that he shot a negro down in the streets.

Mr. SCOTT. Where did he shoot him? Is it true that he shot him at all?

Mr. MERRIMON. The judge was assailed by a drunken negro in his own employ—a bad man—in his own office; and in the rencontre he did fire on the negro, but it is not true that he shot him down. It is true that he was indicted, tried, and acquitted, as I understand.

Mr. SCOTT. I propose to take part in this debate, perhaps, but I shall not now interfere further with the Senator from Indiana, who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. The evidence taken in that case showed that the judge had implored the negro to go away from his office and let him alone, telling him he was drunk; and what he did was strictly in self-defense, and immediately he went before a magistrate and was held for trial according to law. While I am up replying to my friend from Pennsylvania, I want to say to him that there is not a more peaceful, law-abiding, orderly community in the United States than the people of North Carolina at this day. We there have a republican governor, we have a republican judiciary, we have a democratic Legislature, and the whole machinery of the government is going on; all classes and all colors of people are protected, and there is no complaint that I know of. And this republican governor so declared to the Legislature in his message only a short time ago.

Mr. SCOTT. I will not be drawn into the general debate now. I am very glad to have the correction, even so far as it has been made by the Senator from North Carolinia, as to state that there has even been a judicial investigation in that circuit into the cause of the death of that negro; but I cannot refrain from saying even now, with the consent of the Senator from Indiana, that I can perfectly understand how it is that peace and quiet prevail in a district which had to be quieted by the investigations of the judicial arm of the United States for the purpose of suppressing the organization of which that man was a member who now sits as judge over the lives, the liberties, and the property of those persons who were heretofore intimidated and murdered by the Ku-Klux.

Mr. MERRIMON. Let me ask my friend one question.

Mr. MORTON. I believe I shall have to claim the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. With the Senator's permission I want to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. Did it appear in the examination before him that Judge Schenk had committed any offense?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer. It did appear that he was a sworn member of the Ku-Klux organization.

Mr. MERRIMON. Has he not protested against all violence?

Mr. SCOTT. I am speaking, if the Senator will permit me. If, with the avowed purposes and acts of that organization as disclosed in the State of North Carolina, the Senator from North Carolina can say that the man who entered it, continued in it, and did not denounce it, was a good citizen and worthy to fill a judicial position, his estimate of offenses against public policy and mine differ very much.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no apology to make for the Ku-Klux or any of their offenses. I deprecated that organization. I have denounced its crimes and offenses and the organization itself a thousand times over. I believe that it has done the South more injury than anything that has happened since the war, because I believe it has been the main cause of the continuance of the radical rule in the South for four years. If it had not been for that organization it would have ceased long since and not a vestige of it be now left.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from North Carolina speaks, and I have no doubt sincerely, the fact that he regards the Ku-Klux as having been the greatest enemy of the South. It simply calls to my mind one suggestion, that before the appointment of that committee and up to the time of its appointment the existence of Ku-Klux in the South was denied steadily and bitterly upon this floor. It was called "the outrage business" then as now; but the committee were sent down; they took a vast body of evidence, giving the sickening details of the existence of that society, and of its murders and criminal operations. Now we are told that these outrages and murders have not taken place in the South in the last two or three years.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. He says that the existence of the Ku-Klux was denied on this floor.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; it was.

Mr. THURMAN. By whom?

Mr. MORTON. By various members.

Mr. THURMAN. By whom? Name one man, if you can.

Mr. MORTON. I think it was the general tenor of the discussion here.

Mr. THURMAN. I affirm that it never was denied since I have been in this Senate by a single Senator, but on the contrary was condemned by the democratic Senators in as strong language—not as intemperate language, because intemperate language is not always the strongest, but in as strong language—as it ever was by any member of the republican party.

Mr. MORTON. If the existence of that society and its character and operations were ever admitted on this floor before the time that committee made its report I have no recollection of it, and I appeal to the general recollection of Senators on that subject.

Mr. PEASE. If the Senator will yield for a moment, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio a simple question.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

Mr. PEASE. When the Senator from Ohio volunteered so readily to accept the fact of the existence of the Ku-Klux organization in the South, I wanted to ask that honorable Senator this question: Whether he does believe and recognize the existence of the White League in the South, and whether he understands and knows its purposes to-day?

Mr. THURMAN. I know nothing more about its purposes or its existence than I have seen in the public newspapers. I see by the testimony that there is such an organization as the White League, but whether its purposes are lawful or unlawful I do not know. That is a matter that I am not informed about. I know one thing, that the Constitution guarantees to American citizens the right to bear arms.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I must claim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORTON. The answer of my friend from Ohio in regard to the White League, according to my recollection, is very much like the answers that were made in regard to the Ku-Klux. It is a very gingerly admission that even the White League exists; and as to its character, the Senator knows nothing except that he has seen some things in the public prints. It is not admitted in answer to the question that he has an opinion upon the subject himself. But I pass from that. I want to reply to a remark made the day before yesterday by the Senator from Georgia. He was speaking about the general condition of peace in the South, and I understood him to refer to that fact in his State. Am I right?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator to assert in substance that in Georgia there is no violence, there is no intimidation, but that all classes of men enjoy equal rights and privileges. I am not going to call in question the sincerity of the Senator in making that remark, but I must be allowed to express my incredulity, and express the opinion that even in Georgia there is and has been in operation for the last four years a vast system of intimidation and terrorism; and as a foundation for what I am about to say, I will refer to the census of 1870. The population of Georgia in 1870, I believe, was 1,184,169 persons. Of that number 638,926 were whites; of that number 541,092 were blacks; showing that the whites had a majority in the State of about 92,000 in a population of a little less than 1,200,000. In other words, the blacks were pretty nearly one-half. Now I come to the registration made under the authority of General Meade, the commanding officer of that State during reconstruction. That registration shows a return of 96,262 whites and 95,873 blacks; the whites registered outnumbering the blacks less than one thousand. In the first State election that took place in Georgia under the reconstruction acts, which was peaceable and in which everybody was protected in the right to go to the polls, the republican party carried the State by about ten thousand; but in the subsequent election in the same year, 1868, when that protection was withdrawn and after certain violences had taken place in that State, Mr. Seymour carried the State over General Grant by about 45,000. In other words, General Grant then got but little over one-half of the amount of the registered colored vote, to say nothing about the white republicans.

Now, I come to 1872. I have not the full statement here, but I come pretty near it. A friend has furnished it. In 1872, in the State election in Georgia, Smith, the democratic candidate for governor, obtained 104,539 votes; Walker, the republican candidate, 46,475. Smith's majority was 58,000, and Walker's vote less than one-half of the registered colored vote. What has become of the others? Why, sir, a vast system of intimidation——

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator permit me to make a statement on that point?

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to get through.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator is stating figures; and as I was one of the committee appointed by this body to visit the State of Georgia, I became aware of the facts, and the testimony is in print to explain to the honorable Senator the reason why the colored vote fell off in that election when Governor Smith was elected governor. By the constitution of 1868 a tax for school purposes of one dollar per head was imposed, and the prepayment of that tax was made a prerequisite for voting at the elections. The Legislature of 1869, which was a republican Legislature, that party having the majority, were unable to inaugurate a school system for the State. They did find in the treasury of the State some $200,000 that belonged to the school fund and was segregated for educational purposes. They took that money for their own pay, and they passed an act of the Assembly repealing the constitutional provision which required the prepayment of the school-tax. The white men having more sense than to suppose that an act of the Assembly could repeal a constitutional provision, paid the tax to the persons authorized to receive it. Many of the colored people did not pay the tax because they thought they were authorized by an act of the Assembly to override the constitution of the State; and when they came to the polls their votes were refused because they had not complied with the constitutional prerequisite to pay one dollar per head for educational purposes. That was the reason stated and proved, so that even the Senator will not deny it or doubt it if he will examine the testimony taken by the committee in Georgia, of which I was a member myself.

Mr. MORTON. I am not prepared to deny the statement of the Senator from Delaware in regard to the expenses of that school law and its effect. I am merely calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the State of Georgia by the operation of certain causes the republican vote, what we know to be the republican vote, was cut down to less than one-half of the registered colored vote, while the white vote remained in full, giving to the democratic candidate for governor in 1872 fifty-eight thousand majority.

I had a letter on my desk a few moments ago that I was trying to find which went right to the point mentioned by the Senator from Delaware, and I will still try to find it. That letter gave an account of the operation of this one dollar poll-tax for the benefit of the schools in a certain county in Georgia. I forget the name of it, but I will try to find the letter. I am informed that it is the county of Troup. On the day of election some four hundred and fifty colored men were refused at the county seat of that county the right to vote because they could not produce a certificate that they had paid this poll-tax. They went up to the proper officer for the purpose of paying the poll-tax, and after they were there this officer was visited by his bondsmen and the sheriff of the county, who said, "We have withdrawn ourselves as bondsmen from you; you have no right to receive these taxes; you are no longer an acting officer;" and so the collector refused to receive the taxes, and the colored men were cut off from their votes.

Mr. BAYARD. Was that on the day of the election?

Mr. MORTON. On the day of the election, as I am informed.

Mr. GORDON. Allow me——

Mr. MORTON. Let me finish my statement. I have been informed that on the next day the bondsmen went back to this collector and told him they had gone on his bond again and it was all right; that he was not an officer just long enough to prevent the colored men paying their taxes and giving their votes, but he was reinstated on the next day. Now, I want to say that this school-tax business will not account for all this. If the colored men failed to pay their poll-tax to the number of some fifty or sixty thousand, it is to be presumed that a great many white men also failed to pay their tax, and I have heard it said that at various places in Georgia at that election white men were not asked for certificates showing that they had paid their poll-tax; but colored men were asked, and that in that way this vote was largely reduced.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator is undertaking to discuss the provisions of the constitution of Georgia. Does he not know that the constitution of Georgia provided that it must be the tax of the year previous to the offer to vote, and that therefore it would be improper for the voter and it would be too late for him to offer to pay his tax in 1870 when he ought to have paid it in the year 1869, so as to authorize him to vote in 1870. It was the prepayment of the tax in the year before the election that was a requisite to the right to vote at the election.

Mr. MORTON. That does not change the point at all.

Mr. BAYARD. I remember this matter very well. I take it for granted that the honorable Senator does not desire to misstate any fact, and therefore when I can assist him as to the truth of things which passed under my observation, although it may perhaps be inconvenient to be interrupted, yet as it is in the cause of truth, I apprehend that he will pardon the interruption.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow himself to be interrupted by me now?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the Senator to be kind enough to furnish me with the evidence or the source of the evidence in reference to this Troup County matter to which he referred.

Mr. MORTON. I have not the letter here, and I do not know that I should furnish the name if I had it. It is not very safe to give the names of republicans down there who furnish evidence to be used here. I will say this, that I give the statement as it is made to me in a letter which was on my desk this day; and unless the Senator is prepared to deny the statements from persons who were there and knew the facts, I should be very much inclined to believe them to be true, especially in view of the fact that out of ninety-five thousand registered colored voters, besides numerous white republican voters in that State, the republican vote was cut down by the operation of various causes, by technicalities, by cunningly devised laws in regard to taxes, and by terrorism, forty-five thousand votes in 1872. That tells the whole tale. That cannot be explained by these little things. It is part and parcel of the whole system by which the republican party in the South is to be broken down and to lose their votes in States where they have the majority or where they are nearly in the majority.

Mr. GORDON. Now I hope the Senator will allow me to answer the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana consent to the interruption?

Mr. MORTON. I want to be entirely liberal with my friend from Georgia, but I have another matter——

Mr. GORDON. The Senator called on me, and therefore I rose to respond.

Mr. MORTON. I did not call on the Senator to answer now. The Senator in his speech the day before yesterday quoted with a great deal of satisfaction an extract from some testimony that had been furnished to him to show that there had not been any intimidation in Louisiana. I read from his speech:

I want to read a few lines from the testimony given by James Connaughton who was a candidate for the Legislature in Rapides Parish, Louisiana—

I suppose he means at the last election.

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. The testimony is this:

There were about 50 colored votes in the parish polled against him of the 200 who voted. The majority against him was 300, but he has been counted in by the returning board.

My friend of course believed that there was a point. If he had examined somewhat in regard to the parish of Rapides, I think he would not have referred to that testimony. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] has gone to the trouble to give me the data in regard to that parish. Mind you, this testimony quoted by my friend says there were 200 colored votes polled, and this man got 50 of them.

The census of 1870 shows the parish of Rapides to have 7,742 white persons, and one in five being a voter, that would make 1,548 white votes. The colored people in that parish were shown by the census to be 10,267 in number, and one in five would be 2,055 votes. So there were 2,055 colored votes in the parish of Rapides to begin with. The Senator from Louisiana says:

Mr. CARPENTER'S report will show that Grant received in that parish 1,920 votes and Seymour 1,049 votes, that the return made by the Forman board (the democratic board in Louisiana) shows that McEnery received in that parish 1,960 votes and Kellogg 1,169 votes.

Mr. GORDON rose.

Mr. MORTON. Not now, if you please. Take these figures, and what becomes of my friend's statement that the registered colored vote in the parish of Rapides of 1,919 had been reduced to 200 in the last election, of whom 50 voted for this man? Where were the other 1,700? Was there no terrorism there; no intimidation there? Out of 1,900 colored votes in one parish 200 were polled. Did not the other 1,700 want to vote? Why did they not vote? Because of the general causes in operation; of the terrorism which prevailed; and I thank the Senator for having brought that forward. I will now hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. GORDON. I wanted especially to reply to some things that the Senator has said, and first to the Troup County matter in Georgia. The Senator states that he has testimony—

Mr. MORTON. I did not say that, I said I had a letter.

Mr. GORDON. He had a letter. I beg his pardon—the author of which letter he declines to give, and that letter states in substance that four hundred men in the County of Troup, in the State of Georgia, a county in which I read law and in which my connections now reside and about which I know as much probably as any Senator on this floor and a good deal more, were at the last election denied the right to vote because they had not paid the poll tax. The Senator does not give the name of the author of that report. The Senator has my statement that whoever the author be, his statement is utterly, absolutely, and entirely false.

Mr. MORTON. Is that all?

Mr GORDON. No, sir, it is not all by a great deal. He makes——

Mr. MORTON. I shall have to ask to go on with my speech.

Mr. GORDON. Very well. The Senator declines to be answered. If he does not want the facts, and I have no doubt he does not want the facts, then I shall have to submit.

Mr. MORTON. When the Senator is so courteous as to say that I do not want the facts, I have no reply to make to that remark. He has given——

Mr. GORDON. The Senator asked me to reply and then declined to hear me.

Mr. MORTON. He has given his statement in regard to the county of Troup. I give him the statement made to me in a letter. Perhaps I may have authority to give the name of the author.

Mr. GORDON. I beg to correct him. He did not allow me to give the statement; he cut me off when I proposed to give the statement. I proposed to give the statement. I denied his statement and proposed to give mine.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator, I believe, put in a general denial of the whole of it; said that it was unqualifiedly false. If there is anything further, very well.

Mr. GORDON. There is, because I want to tell how that happened which did happen, and the Senator does not allow me. I do not wonder he does not want the facts.

Mr. MORTON. I am not at all alarmed by this demonstration on the part of my friend. I am inclined to think the statements that were made to me were true; but if the Senator has personal knowledge that they are not true I will take his statement; but until he states it from personal knowledge, I shall put the letter against his statement, because if he states from information and I state from information, we are both on a par in that particular.

Mr. GORDON. I will not interrupt the Senator at all to make any further remarks, but I beg him to allow me to say this, that I now give notice to the Senate that as soon as I can get the floor I will give a statement of the facts.

Mr. MORTON. I have no sort of objection. The Senator has a right to do it unquestionably, and if he can show that the statement is not correct it is a point in his favor, and if he can further explain how the republican vote has been cut down from over one hundred thousand in the State of Georgia to forty-five thousand, and that that has been done legitimately, without terrorism and without fraud, he will relieve the democratic party of Georgia from an imputation that now rests upon it, and will rest upon it until that fact can be shown.

I was commenting upon this matter in regard to Louisiana, that the illustration made by the Senator from Georgia from the parish of Rapides is directly in line with all the evidence we have from that State; that in a parish where there were over nineteen hundred colored votes there were only two hundred votes cast at the last election, and yet we are told there was no intimidation.

Sir, I have spoken a great deal longer than I intended to to-night. I simply wanted to show the application and the pertinency of the amendment which I have offered. The information asked for is of the most important character, and I want to say to Senators right here that we propose to go to the bottom of this question. We propose not to be turned off the track and switched off by mere questions of technicality, by merely legal questions; but we want the whole country to understand what is the true condition of Louisiana and other States in the South. We want it to be understood that violence prevails there, and, as we believe, as part of a system for political purposes; and that the intention is to seize the control of certain States in the South by means of violence—even of murder. I do not say how many persons are concerned in this. I only know that there is nobody in those States who is able to repel it or is able to punish it. There is nobody in those States who can roll it back. Even if my friend from Georgia and my friend from North Carolina were to go home and to endeavor to stem this dark tide, it would roll over them, submerge them, and politically they would be lost forever.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is no such tide in my State, sir.

Mr. GORDON. Is the Senator from Indiana done?

Mr. MORTON. Not quite.

Mr. President, I am just reminded of an important fact in regard to the existence of a general conspiracy to deprive the colored people of the right of suffrage and destroy their political rights. I am just reminded of a passage in the report made by the Senator from Delaware to which he referred himself this morning:

As we have just remarked, we do not propose to discuss at large the question of negro government in these pages; but we feel that it would be a dereliction of duty on our part if, after what we have witnessed in South Carolina, we did not admonish the American people that the present condition of things in the South cannot last. It was an oft quoted political apothegm, long prior to the war, that no government could exist "half slave and half free." The paraphrase of that proposition is equally true, that no government can long exist "half black and half white."

* * * * * * *

The mind of every thinking man is troubled about our future. He knows that a conflict of races must be the inevitable result of such a policy. In a struggle for the political power of the State this conflict is already as clearly marked as white is from black. The line of separation between parties there to-day is not only one of color and distinctive races, naked and unbroken, but it is a question of supremacy, of exclusive tenure to office, of the right to govern, and a separation of representation from taxation. Such an anomalous state of affairs as one race ruling the other has never existed in any form of government, republican or monarchical, except by force and coercion. There can be neither sympathy nor harmony in any polity where such antagonism is attempted to be overcome by law. God's law is higher than man's law. Man's puny statutes cannot repeal or nullify the immutable ordinances of the Almighty. Those whom God has separated let no man join together. There can be no permanent partition of power, nor any peaceable joint exercise of power, among such discordant bodies of men. One or the other must have all or none. It is the very acme of folly and fanaticism to suppose, in this day of enlightenment and its consequent pride of feeling among the superior race, that there can be a reproduction of the ancient fable of tying the living and the dead together without causing death to both.

* * * * * * *

Such a state of things may last so long as the party shall last which had the power and audacity to inaugurate it, and no longer. But whenever that party shall go down, as go down it will at some time not long in the future, that will be the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent. Men in the frenzy of political passions may shut their eyes to this fact now, but it will come at any time when the negro shall cease to be a party necessity in the politics of this country.

This report is signed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] and by Hon. Frank P. Blair, Hon. S. S. COX, Hon. JAMES B. BECK, Hon. P. Van Trump, Hon. A. M. WADDELL, Hon. J. C. ROBINSON, Hon. J. M. Hanks.

I believe what I have read foreshadowed the policy of to-day. I believe that when the republican party shall go down, if go down it must, and the control of the States and of the General Government shall pass into the hands of the democratic party, then the attempt will be made to take away the political and civil rights of the negro. We are told that it will be the end of the power of the negro on this continent. I am not so sure of that, nay, I do not believe that; but I believe it will be the time when the attempt will be made to destroy the political power of the negro upon this continent and to rob him of those rights which have been conferred upon him.

Finance.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN M. BRIGHT,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1875,

On the Senate Finance bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I propose to give some reasons why I cannot vote for the Senate finance bill now pending before the House. It seems to be a dish cooked to suit the taste of the President, as it is but the embodiment of the views expressed in his financial veto message of last session.

The present bill provide, first, for the coinage of fractional silver to redeem the outstanding fractional currency; second, for the repeal of the charge of ½ of 1 per cent. for coinage; third, for the removal of restrictions on the amount of national-bank circulation; fourth, for the repeal of that clause of the finance bill of last session which required the redistribution of $55,000,000 of national-bank currency; fifth, for the redemption of legal-tender notes in excess of $300,000,000, amounting to 80 per cent. of the new national-bank notes to be issued in their place; sixth, for the redemption in coin of the legal-tender notes outstanding after the 1st of January, 1879; seventh, for raising the coin for the redemption of the notes by the use of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or by the sale of bonds payable in coin under the act of July 14, 1870, and eighth, for the repeal of all laws inconsistent with the provisions of the bill.

As to that clause of the bill which provides for the repeal of the charge on coinage, I make no point. It would have a tendency to encourage the home coinage of the precious metals. England has authorized free coinage since 18 Charles II.

That clause of the bill which provides for the repeal of the law of last session requiring the redistribution of $55,000,000 of national currency among the States according to wealth and population is intended to take immediate effect and prevent the redistribution and to secure and perpetuate a financial advantage to certain States to the injustice and prejudice of others. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency to the present session shows that the unequal distribution still exists.

The six New England States have an excess of $69,905,101; the five Middle States have an excess of $7,861,239; the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States have a deficiency of $52,467,842; the nine Western States have a deficiency of $23,063,966; and the nine Pacific States and three Territories have a deficiency of $7,972,619. The Eastern and Middle States have an excess of $78,295,579.

The same report shows the following per capita circulation: The six New England States have $31.45, the Middle have $12.66, the fourteen Southern and Southwestern have $2.81, the nine Western have $6.86, and the eleven Pacific and Territories have $2.

The act of last session ordering the redistribution of the currency conceded the justice of the measure. Now it is proposed to go back and revive the iniquity. Free banking will be no compensation for the injustice to the destitute States, as I will show in another connection. It is only a contrivance to direct all the trade winds and gulf streams to the favored sections. A large part of the productions of the South and West is diverted from the natural commercial channels and are thrown thousands of miles across the interior at ruinous rates of transportation. Our one-sided financial condition, sanctioned by law, has thrown our whole commercial gravitation out of course. In the one section where money is plenty labor is rewarded and productions in the vicinity command a fair priee. The reverse is true where the money is scarce. Look to New Orleans, that beautiful city of the sun, at whose feet the din of commerce used to roar day and night, with money exchanges in her favor, and with a commercial outlook equal to that of ancient Tyre, but now despoiled of her trade and wasting in decay. She is now without money to pay for the great staples sugar and cotton, but the stranger generally pays for them with checks on the great money centers of the East, and the checks are applied to the payment of merchants' accounts, or used in the purchase of goods at high prices, which are to be consumed at the South. So the revolution of the wheel of commerce empties but little money into her lap. In the mean time she is devoured with taxation. Other sections may read their commercial fate in Louisiana with a continuation of our present financial policy.

Nature is suggestive of a great destiny for western and southern commerce. She points to the great territory lying between the Alleghany and the Rocky Mountains, rich in soil as the delta of the Nile, and divided in the middle by the grand old "king of floods." The turbid Missouri, child of the Rocky Mountains, comes from the West; the placid Ohio, daughter of the Alleghanies, comes from the East; the crystal lakes of the North send their tributes chilled with drifting ice. In short, the whole fifteen hundred tributaries of the Mississippi are gathered home as a patriarch would gather his children to his bosom, and the commingling of waters and soils into the common flood as it turns head and drives to pour its grand libation into the Gulf, is but the herald of our interoceanic commerce to the open seas. I would injure none, but have all our sections march abreast in the race of improvement. But I do protest against the consolidation of a great money power in this country, which, unchecked, sooner or later, will subjugate both the Government and the people.

But to pass on. That clause of the bill which provides for the redemption of fractional currency with fractional silver coin is unnecessary, expensive, and in the interests of the money power. The facts will prove my position. The report of the Treasurer of the United States for 1874 shows the amount of fractional currency outstanding to be $45,880,002.34. Our Government has no silver which can be used for coinage to redeem the fractional currency. The existing law pledges our duties, first, to the payment of interest on the public debt; second, to the payment of 1 per cent. of the sinking fund; third, the residue to be paid into the Treasury.

In proof that the silver cannot be raised from duties, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimates for 1875 shows a deficiency in the sinking fund of $22,093,748.43, and the deficiency for 1876, $11,920,914.

The report of the Treasurer for 1874 shows a falling off in the customs for last year $24,985,685.01, and a falling off in internal revenue $11,920,914, making a total decrease of revenue $36,349,218.25. So there is no "surplus" nor "residue" now in the Treasury, nor the promise of any, out of which the silver can be raised. Then the only alternative is to raise it by the sale of coin bonds under the act of July 14, 1870. Humiliating spectacle, to see the Government a suppliant at the feet of the money power to borrow silver to redeem her fractional currency!

But let us see something of the cost of converting the fractional currency into fractional silver. The act of July 14, 1870, amended by the act of January 20, 1871, under which the bonds are to be issued, provides that the bonds shall bear 5 per cent. interest payable quarterly, and the principal payable in ten years. The quarterly interest makes it about equal to 6 per cent. per annum. If these bonds are payable in gold, as the friends of the bill contend they are, then they are to be sold at par for silver. The gold is now worth 6 per cent. more than silver. This would make a difference in the value of silver to be raised and the gold bonds of $2,902,800. But this is not all. The annual interest on these bonds is $2,900,000, and in ten years the interest will amount to $29,000,000, making exchange and interest for ten years $31,902,800; and still the principal, $45,880,002, not paid.

This is a little financial stroke which plays handsomely into the hands of the money power; whereas the fractional currency costs but little more than the paper and printing, is more portable than silver, and being the symbol of the national credit it is used as a medium for the exchange of our property and productions and the payment of our debts and taxes, is a legal tender in sums under five dollars and exchangeable for legal-tender notes at the Treasury of the United States.

The fractional silver could have no greater use, for it would not be a legal tender for any sum over five dollars. The people are not demanding such a measure. It would be paying too much for the whistle. But this is not the worst; it is only the child out of which the giant is yet to grow.

The bill next provides for the redemption in coin of $82,000,000 of legal-tender notes, being the amount in excess of $300,000,000. If there was no surplus in the Treasury to raise silver, there would be none to raise gold. Then the gold must be raised by the sale of more gold bonds. Gold is now worth 12 per cent. more than legal-tender notes. The difference in the value of $82,000,000 legal-tender notes and gold would be $9,800,000. The annual interest on the gold bonds would be $4,920,000 and the interest for ten years would be $49,200,000, which added to the exchange would make $59,000,000; and still at the end of ten years the principal would be unpaid. On the other hand, the legal-tender notes cost but a trifle, bear no interest, and answer all the purposes for the exchange of commerce and the payment of taxes and debts, except interest on the public debt and duties on foreign goods. Again, the bill provides that $100,000,000 new national-bank notes shall be issued in the place of the $82,000,000 legal-tender notes redeemed. This would not increase the volume of currency, as $20,000,000 of the outstanding legal-tender notes would be withdrawn from circulation to be held as a reserve for deposits in the national banks.

So far as the people are concerned, the practical result of the transaction would be the swapping off of $82,000,000 of legal-tender notes for national-bank notes at a cost of $59,000,000, exchange and interest for ten years. It is all for the bondholders and nothing for the people. A guardian would be removed from office who would change his ward's debt from a non-interest to an interest-bearing debt.

Again, the bill provides for the redemption of the $300,000,000 legal-tender notes outstanding after the 1st of January, 1879. For the reasons stated before, the Government will be compelled to resort to the sale of more bonds to raise the coin. The gold being worth 12 per cent. more than Treasury notes, it would make a difference in the value of the notes and bonds of $36,000,000. The annual interest on these bonds would be $18,000,000, and the interest for ten years would amount to $180,000,000, making a total for exchange and interest for ten years of $216,000,000; and still the principal due and unpaid.

As it is contemplated, suppose the national banks issue $300,000,000 of their notes in the place of the $300,000,000 legal-tender notes redeemed, and that they should make an estimated gross profit of 15 per cent. per annum for ten years, it would give an aggregate of $450,000,000.

Then sum up the result of converting the fractional currency and legal-tender notes into coin bonds, we have the following:

Exchange for fractional currency	$2,902,800
Exchange of $382,000,000 legal-tender notes	45,840,000
Interest on bonds exchanged for fractional currency and legal-tender notes for ten years	252,028,000
Gross profits of national banks on $382,000,000 for ten years at 15 per cent	450,000,000
Total	750,770,800

To say the least of it, a large proportion of this amount would be ground out of the people in ten years by the stupendous extortions of the bill. Whatever may be said in palliation of the items of exchange and bank profits, there can be no question that the interest on the bonds to raise coin for the redemption of fractional currency and legal-tender notes would cost $252,028,000 in ten years, which would have to be raised by taxation. And at the end of the time the people would have to face the principal of the bonds, amounting to $427,880,000, due and unpaid, and no doubt with an empty Treasury, if the logic of this policy is pursued to its conclusion. And at the time these bonds fall due there perhaps will be due $1,000,000,000 of other bonds, and the holders demanding payment, or to have their bonds refunded, and the revenues of the country farmed out to them for another term of years.

I warn the country now of the "dismal swamp" which lies ahead of this wicked policy, a policy which builds up the money power on the distress of the people. I protest against yielding the country a prey to such a system of usury and plunder.

I propose now to show that the bill is hollow with delusion, and that its proposed gold basis is like the boy's phantom gold at the end of the rainbow. After a course of financial tribulation, it will end in disappointment and disaster. Our financial system has a foreign as well as domestic relation. Financial theories may be certain in their normal application, but they become as treacherous as the faithful compass when swayed by foreign influence.

Among the great nations of the earth ours is the richest in mines but poorest in coins. The golden Pactolus sweeps through our land but to bear its treasures to other shores. With mountains of gold and silver, we cannot command a home coin to purchase the new bonds which the bill would put upon the market. Like the victim already fastened in the toils of the usurer, we look to Europe in our emergency. And now to the facts.

The Director of the Mint, in his report for 1874, estimates our present supply of gold and silver coin at $166,846,228; but at the time of his report he perhaps was not aware of the fact, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1874, page vi, that there was due to the sinking fund $22,093,748; and, as shown by the same report, page 24, there was a balance due for interest on the public debt of $5,636,995. These amounts together make $27,730,743, which, if it had been paid, would for the most part have been exported and applied to our foreign debt, and being taken from the $166,846,228, would leave only $139,730,743 as the true proximate amount of gold and silver coin in the United States. Both the Director of the Mint and the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics last year estimated our coin at $140,000,000. So in fact there has been no increase. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report for 1874, page xxv, says that our present annual demands "cannot be safely stated at less than $160,000,000 in gold, besides the receipts from internal revenue and other sources."

So it must be apparent that our new supply must come from Europe. The result will be an increase of our foreign debt $427,880,000, and an increase of our annual interest $25,672,800. Another result is the repeal of the legal-tender act of 1862 by the artful phraseology of the bill, in the clause repealing all laws inconsistent with its provisions. The legal-tender notes being all redeemed, nothing but gold and silver then would be a legal tender. No doubt the draughtsman thought it a handsome feat of cunning; but the result of such cunning would prove a terrible calamity to the country. To make nothing but gold now a legal tender, as I said in a former speech, June 13, 1874—

> Would give an additional value to the demands of the creditor of 12½ per cent., and subtract a corresponding value from the productions and property of the debtor. The public and private debt of our country amounts to about $8,160,469,000. To pay it in gold it would require a premium of about $1,000,000,000, and a corresponding increase of the value of the interest on the debt by making it payable in gold. The aggregate annual taxation of our country amounts to about $611,180,320; it would add an annual value of about $80,000,000 if paid in gold. The result—$1,000,000,000 profit to the creditor, $1,000,000,000 confiscation to the debtor, $80,000,000 additional annual taxation to the people! Comforting pictures for a distressed people!

All our State bonds which were contracted in contemplation of payment in legal-tender notes would then become payable in gold, which would not only create a new burden of taxation, but it would engender political discontent under a sense of outrage and injustice.

But this is not all. The bill provides that the legal-tender notes shall be redeemed "at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York." This would make this great financial center a mighty maelstrom to swallow down three hundred millions from circulation in the country, there to be hoarded by banks, brokers, and gold rings, and aggravating the evils of an already consolidated money power.

But this would not be the end of the "Iliad of our woes." I come now to the most remarkable, as it is the most alarming and mischievous feature of the bill. After converting a non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing one—after juggling the gold for the redemption of the legal-tender notes into the hands of the money kings in the city of New York—and though the bill wears upon its front an imposing title, like the phylactery of the Pharisee, "AN ACT to provide for the resumption of specie payment," it slips the bridle and abandons the whole field of currency to the national banks, without a single provision for the redemption of their notes in coin, or for making their notes a legal-tender for the payment of debts or taxes among the people and States.

> O, for a forty-parson power
> To sing thy praise, Hypocrisy!

Perhaps the proper construction of the bill would require the banks to keep their reserves as a security for deposits in coin, 5 per cent. of which is required to be kept in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of their notes.

But I have said that the bill abandons the field of currency to the national banks.

The gold coin used for the redemption of legal-tender notes will soon be spirited away. The States and other corporations are prohibited by a tax of 10 per cent. from issuing bank-notes. Thus the absence of other currency will make the national-bank notes a forced currency on the people. And still they cannot be used in the payment of individual debts and taxes to the States without their consent. It is true that the national banking act provides that the notes of the national banks shall be received by the United States in payment of taxes and dues to the United States, except for duties on imports and for debts owed by the United States and interest on the public debt; but this only shows that the Federal Government has placed itself in the power of the national banks to furnish a currency for the payment of internal taxes and dues to the Government. Hence it will appear that both Government and people are placed in the power of the national banks.

Under the control of bank speculators the prices of productions and property would be as variable as the wind. Like other banks, they contract and expand, suspend and break. They will all be in financial sympathy and commercial connection. One shock will send a financial paralysis to the whole, as it did in 1873. They bank largely on deposits, for which there is no security except an average reserve of about 20 per cent., 15 per cent. of which is required to be kept in their own vaults and 5 per cent. in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of their notes. Jay Cooke has taught them all how to break. Let one financial gale sweep the country, and the Government and people might wake up some morning and find themselves without a currency. These national-bank notes would not even have the legal-tender quality of the notes of the old United States Bank, which provided that—

The bills and notes of the bank shall be receivable in all payments to the United States.

Viewed from my stand-point, it would be a political crime to abandon the Government and people to the national banks. Whenever it is done, I warn the country that "Black Fridays," financial convulsions, commercial prostration, bankruptcy, and political corruption all lie ahead. Each financial panic costs the country not less than $1,000,000,000.

The banks, once rooted in their power, will aspire to make Presidents and to control the legislation of the country. They would hold their national conventions to mature their measures and plan their campaigns.

There are now two thousand and twenty-eight national banks. State banks being taxed out of existence, they would have undisputed sway. Suppose each bank had one hundred necessitous debtors, it would give an aggregate of 202,800. Then suppose the bank directors wanted votes, petitions signed, or measures advocated, what fearful havoc it would make with the freedom of elections and the virtue of legislation! Speaking of the political influence of banks, Mr. Madison, in a letter to Thomas Jefferson, April 23, 1796, wrote:

The banks have been powerfully felt in the progress of the petitions in the cities for the treaty. Scarce a merchant or a trader but what depends on discounts, and at this moment there is a general pinch for money. Under such circumstances a bank director soliciting subscriptions is like a highwayman with a pistol demanding the purse.

The old United States Bank, in its desperate struggle for its recharter, made every industry quail before its supremacy. The financial bulletins of Nicholas Biddle were as potential as the ukase of Nicholas the Autocrat. By collecting loans, refusing discounts, and undermining State banks, he brought the nation a suppliant at his feet. The country cried out with the pains of financial contraction, and the tables of Congress groaned with distress-petitions.

Mr. Benton, in his Thirty Years' View, says the power of the bank was "exemplified in her capacity to have Jackson condemned, the Government directors and a Secretary of the Treasury rejected, a committee of the House of Representatives repulsed, and the country convulsed and agonized." It only succumbed to Jackson and the veto.

Let us pause to inquire what possible gain there can be in superseding the legal-tender notes. The use of money gives it its chief significance. These notes are used as a medium of exchange for all our productions and property and for the payment of all our debts and taxes, except interest on the public debt and duties on imports. It floats our entire home commerce, which is 1,000 per cent. greater than our foreign commerce. We have annual productions of all industries about $9,000,000,000, while we have only about $600,000,000 foreign imports. It is not needed as an exchange for our foreign commerce, as our exports about cancel our imports. Our legal-tender notes are not intended for a foreign circulation, and as they are answering all the demands of our home circulation I cannot see the reason, the justice, or the economy in paying $732,000,000, which I have shown it will cost, directly and indirectly, in ten years to effect the exchange of the fractional and legal-tender notes into gold bonds, and at the end of the time have the principal of the bonds to pay—amounting to $427,880,000.

It is time for the Government to call a halt in its reckless extravagance. It is time the people were overhauling the cash account and liabilities of the Government.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1874 (see appendix A) shows that the net ordinary receipts of the Government (excluding receipts from loans and Treasury notes) from 1865 to 1874, were $4,366,366,321; net ordinary expenditures for the same time, $4,347,995,093. Out of the amount collected the Government has reduced the public debt $521,545,705, leaving a balance of $3,826,449,386. Out of this balance the Government has in the same time paid interest in gold to the bondholders $1,211,403,003. The remaining balance, $2,615,046,383, has been applied to the necessary expenses of the Government and a large portion squandered in subsidies and other extravagancies.

With proper economy $1,000,000,000 of the last balance might have been applied to the payment of the public debt. And still we have an outstanding public debt of $2,251,690,468, as appears from the same report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a part of which, say $1,800,000,000, is bearing interest, while we have the cry to have $428,000,000 non-interest-bearing currency transmuted into interest-bearing gold bonds—calling for $26,000,000 additional annual taxation. Is our Government to remain deaf to the cry of distress which comes up from our toiling millions, or is it to lend its ear to and lavish its compassion upon the money-leeches of Europe who are crying for a new gorge from our already depleted veins?

But, independent of all this, the Secretary of the Treasury calls for more money to meet existing liabilities. He showed the deficiency in the revenue to be $36,349,218.25. Therefore his "voice is still for war"—a war of taxation on the people. He calls for a tax on tea and coffee, which happily blend in them the character of necessaries and luxuries to the laboring millions.

Neither I nor the country will stop to argue with the Secretary the exploded fallacy that a tax on tea and coffee will not commercially enhance the price. Let Congress heed his voice in the face of the enormous expenditures of the Government and the distress of the people, and "the tempest in the tea-pot" will gather into a national tornado.

But we are told that gold coin will take the place of the legal-tender notes, which will be exchanged for gold bonds. Yes, it may come, and it will almost as quickly go. What is poured in at the bung will soon run out at the spigot. Let us see. The report of the Director of the Mint for 1874 (see appendix C) estimates the products of our gold mines since 1849 at $1,240,750,000; products of our silver mines for same time, $189,000,000, making together $1,429,750,000. Deduct from this $140,000,000, amount of gold coin on hand, and we have $1,269,750,000 which has disappeared from the country. Poor husbandry of gold! But see how the Government, not the people, has opened the arteries for its outflow from the country.

Our foreign debt, at the least estimate by the Chief of Statistics, is $1,200,000,000. And now we propose to increase it $428,000,000, making together $1,628,000,000. The annual interest on this amount, including expenses of collecting, will amount to $100,000,000.

The average products of our gold mines for the last five years, as per last report of the Director of the Mint, amount to $40,000,000; so it is apparent the annual interest on the foreign debt will exhaust our annual gold products and require $60,000,000 of the newly-imported coin to pay it off. So that in about seven years the borrowed $428,000,000 would be drawn off on the interest account alone.

If the foreign interest is payable in silver as well as in gold, then the average of our silver mines, $23,000,000, for the last five years should be added to the annual product of gold, and together they would make the average $63,000,000 per annum. This sum the foreign interest would exhaust, and require annually $37,000,000 of the loan coin to pay it off. So in about twelve years the foreign interest alone, after exhausting the joint products of our gold and silver mines, would absorb all the loan, and leave the principal unpaid.

In connection with our coinage I will develop another grievous outrage upon the people of the country. The act of 1837 made all silver coins, from a half-dime to one dollar, a legal tender for all sums. The act of 1853, however, made all fractional silver coins from a half-dime to a half-dollar a legal tender only to the extent of five dollars, leaving the silver dollar a legal tender for all sums.

The act of June 25, 1834, made the silver dollar, of not less than four hundred and fifteen grains, of Mexico, Peru, Chili, Central America, and Brazil, a legal tender.

The act of May, 1846, made nearly all the foreign moneys of account, at fixed values, of European nations, a legal tender. These acts all remained unrepealed until the act of February 12, 1873, which enacted—

That the silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, * * * and said coins shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding five dollars in any one payment.

The act of July 14, 1870, authorizing the refunding of our national bonds, provides that the bonds issued under it shall be redeemable "in coin at its then standard value," which stipulation is inserted in the bonds and forms a part of the original contract. This is the only class of bonds payable in coin by express stipulation. Twelve other different classes of bonds were issued since February, 1861, and prior to the refunding act of 1870, all of which express on their face to pay dollars, with interest at a rate stated.

The point which I make is this, that the bonds, principal and interest, were payable in gold or silver coin up to the passage of the act of February 14, 1873. I waive the question at present whether the bonds payable in dollars were solvable in legal-tender notes. If they were payable in silver coin in dollar pieces, why did the financial ministers of the Government pay in gold, or its equivalent, interest amounting to $1,211,403,003 and principal amounting to $521,545,705, making together $1,732,948,708, when the gold was worth 6 per cent. more than silver, making a loss to the Government and people of $103,976,922.48?

But this is not all. The act of 1793 provided that "the proportional value of gold to silver * * * shall be as 15 to 1, according to quantity in weight." This act remains unrepealed. In Mexico, South America, Spain, Portugal, and in the West Indies generally, the value of gold is 16 to 1 over silver, and in Cuba said to be as high as 17 to 1. If the financial ministers had been as shrewd in protecting the people as the bond-holders were as calculating to turn profits into their coffers, why did they not take the gold and exchange it for silver in other countries when it was worth 16 for 1 in value, and bring it home and pay the debts 15 to 1, and save one dollar out of every sixteen, or 6 per cent. on the amount paid? By this process $100,000,000 could have been saved on the payments already made. The silver was abundant and could have been easily obtained. The American silver mines were turning out an annual average of $23,000,000, and on the increase. The Director of the Mint in his last report, speaking of the quantity of gold and silver coin and bullion in the world, says:

> The world's stock of precious metals is generally estimated at from ten to twelve thousand million dollars, nearly equally divided as to the two metals.

All the bonds of the United States which by their terms are payable in coin at its then standard value may be paid in silver one-dollar pieces, which were a legal tender for any amount at the time, as much so as gold; and they ought yet to be paid in silver coin, for the double reason that it would meet the contract, and be to the advantage of the people 6 per cent. of the amount, being the difference in the value of gold and silver.

In like manner all the bonds payable in dollars may, and should be, discharged in legal-tender notes, for the same reasons, that they meet the contract and it would be to the advantage of the people 12 per cent. of the amount, being the difference between gold and legal-tender notes. But of this in another connection.

The country has been laid under usury and extortion and flayed and victimized long enough. The Government, instead of being animated by a sense of paternal fairness and justice to the people, has been obsequious in its concessions to the bondholders, many of whom are citizens of foreign governments.

To appease their clamor it gave them bonds bearing a coin interest, worth at the time $1,000,000,000 more in value than the depreciated currency paid for the bonds. It passed a declaratory act in 1869 saying that the principal of the bonds should be paid in coin or its equivalent, when the bonds by the terms were payable in dollars. It authorized by the act of 1870 the refunding of the bonds payable in dollars into 5 per cent. bonds payable in coin, with the interest payable semi-annually, and by the amended act of 1871 it made the interest on these payable quarterly, thereby making the 5 per cent. interest equivalent to 6 per cent. per annum. And the Government is at present paying the holders of these 5 per cent. bonds annually $4,934,386, the difference between the semi-annual and quarterly interest on $315,800,750, the amount of the outstanding 5 per cent. bonds. It has paid in gold since 1865, as I have shown, in interest and part of the principal of the public debt, $1,732,948,708, when it might have been paid, to say the least, in silver coin, and by proper financial skill have saved $200,000,000 to the people. It changed our coinage by the act of 1873 so as to destroy the legal-tender quality of silver coin except in sums under five dollars, and thus in the main to expel it as a currency from the country and leave the bondholders masters of the gold fields. And it now proposes to make our bonded debt permanent and to multiply the pernicious fecundity of the bonds by continuing them as an indispensable capital of the national banks. The whole design seems to have been to turn the people, property, and productions of the country over a lawful prey for the rapacity and speculation of the money power. And still the Government has no cure for these evils except more gold bonds and the increased taxation of the people. And the people might reply to the Government in the terrible irony of Patrick Henry:

> Shall we fill the pocket of the spendthrift with money to cure him of his prodigality?

For all these evils judgment is with the people.

But to return to the Senate bill. It provides for a financial system so loosely and clumsily fabricated that it will be undermined by its own operation. I assume that after the legal-tender notes are all redeemed—and it is impossible for the banks to prevent their redemption—the banks would be compelled to substitute as their reserves in their place gold coin, the gold being the only "lawful money" above five dollars. Then they would have to keep 5 per cent. of their deposits in gold in the Treasury of the United States for the redemption of their notes. To show how it would operate: The present amount of reserves in the national banks, as per last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, amount to $87,473,895, and the reserves in the Treasury amount to $17,054,108. Suppose this reserve in the Treasury to be in gold, it would be more valuable than national-bank notes, the European gold-mongers would draw it off at the Treasury faucet as fast as the banks could fill up the cask. Thus the banks in a few months could be drained of their gold. The only way to arrest it would be to cease to keep deposits. Having no deposits, they would be required to keep no reserves. Then they would be limited to banking on such national-bank notes as they might own. The result would be that they would not be required to keep any gold to redeem their notes at their own counter or at the Treasury.

And here is the end of the gold logic of the bill—free banks without coin; gold bonds and increased taxation in the place of free currency. The whole scheme seems to have been concocted in the interest of the money power. Perhaps the President and his Cabinet officers, members of Congress, and other Government officials would draw their pay in gold if the bill should go into operation. The Government seems to have been so much in the habit of plundering the people that it is willing to keep up the habit for the benefit of the foreign bondholder.

But the bill is singularly defective in this, that it provides no tax to pay the interest on the bonds which are to be raised under it. The bonds will find slow sale without some tax being pledged to pay the interest. If this Congress has courage to pass the bill, it ought to have courage to levy the tax to pay the interest. But it shrewdly plays off from the tax question, hoping, perhaps, to make another Congress responsible for its levy.

I think I have said enough to uncover to the eyes of the American people the monstrous iniquity of the bill.

I turn now to present briefly another and more hopeful aspect of our financial affairs.

It is true that our financial affairs at this time are deplorable, but not desperate. The Government has taken charge of the national currency, has deprived the States of a local currency by taxing State banks out of existence, and the States and people are now lying at the feet of the Government, like Lazarus at the gate of the rich man, waiting for the crumbs to fall from the table. The Government by a few more turns of the contraction screws can bankrupt the mass of the people, and break down the State governments for the want of money to administer them.

The Government having taken the charge and responsibility of the national finances, it can and ought to furnish a safe currency, a cheap currency, and an abundant currency.

A safe currency can be furnished in the legal-tender notes. They are as safe as the credit of the Government, safe as the bonds, and safe as the Government itself. These notes were proof against the violence of the tempest which recently swept the financial sea. Commerce howled for help through Wall street in vain. The national banks were congealed and powerless in the panic. The national Treasury was besieged by frantic suppliants to procure, contrary to law, the launch of a new installment of Treasury notes as the only life-boat to which they could cling to outride the storm. President Grant, proud of the triumph of the national credit, in his annual message to Congress for 1873, uses the following exultant language:

> The experience of the present panic has proven that the currency of the country, based as it is upon the credit of the country, is the best that has ever been devised.

This ought to be sufficient proof of the safety of the Treasury notes.

That these notes are the cheapest currency no one can deny. They bear no interest. They pay for all the expenses of their manufacture in their use. Interest has been the bane of nearly all money systems, the cormorant which preys upon the fruits of human labor. It is the heaviest curse now resting on American industries. Its removal is the greatest measure of relief, and is to be one of the greatest questions of the day. The Treasury notes pass from the Government to the people without passing through the banks and being subject to bank rates of interest. They are more democratic than any other currency, if to subserve the great interest of the people be a test of democracy. They are the people's money, and their freedom from interest brings them into antagonism with our existing bond and bank monopolies, which are the hardest masters over the people.

If Thomas Jefferson is good authority for democracy he might be adduced as a witness in favor of Treasury notes over all other paper currency. In volume 6, pages 139 and 140 of his Correspondence, letter to John W. Epps, June 24, 1813, he says:

> And so the nation may continue to issue its bills as far as its wants require and the limits of the circulation will admit. Those limits are understood to extend with us at present to $200,000,000, a greater sum than would be necessary for any war. But this, the only resource which the Government could command with certainty, the States have unfortunately fooled away, nay, corruptly alienated to swindlers and shavers under the color of private banks. Say, too, as an additional evil, that the disposal funds of individuals, to this great amount, have thus been drawn from improvement and useful enterprise, and employed in the useless, usurious, and demoralizing practices of bank directors and their accomplices.
> In the war of 1755 our State availed itself of this fund by issuing a paper money bottomed on a specific tax for its redemption, and, to insure its credit, bearing an interest of 5 per cent. Within a very short time not a bill of this emission was to be found in circulation. It was locked up in the chests of executors, guardians, widows, farmers, &c. We then issued bills bottomed on a redeeming tax, but bearing no interest. These were readily received, and never depreciated a single farthing. * * * If Treasury bills are emitted on a tax appropriated for their redemption in fifteen years, and (to insure preference in the first moments of competition) bearing an interest of 6 per cent., there is no one who would not take them in preference to bank paper now afloat, on a principle of patriotism as well as interest; and they would be withdrawn from circulation into private hoards to a considerable amount. Their credit once established, others might be emitted, bottomed also on a tax, but not bearing interest; and if ever their credit faltered, open public loans, on which alone these bills should be received as specie. These, operating as a sinking fund, would reduce the quantity in circulation so as to maintain that in an equilibrium with specie. It is not easy to estimate the obstacles which, in the beginning, we should encounter in ousting the banks from their possession of the circulation; but a steady and judicious alternation of emissions and loans would reduce them in time. * * * But it will be asked, are we to have no banks? Are merchants and others to be deprived of the resource of short accommodations, found so convenient? I answer, let us have banks. * * * There is not a bank of discount on the continent of Europe (or at least there was not one while I was there) which offers anything but cash in exchange for discounted bills. No one has a natural right to the trade of a money-lender but he who has money to lend. Let those, then, among us who have a moneyed capital, and who prefer employing it in loans rather than otherwise, set up banks, and give cash or national bills for the notes they discount.

So it will be seen that Mr. Jefferson's leading idea was that national Treasury notes should form the currency of the country. I do not see how any democrat, upon due consideration, can be an advocate of national banks, which fire with a double-barrel monopoly on the people—interest on their bonds and interest on their loans. As suggested by Mr. Jefferson, every citizen, upon a principle of patriotism and national pride, would feel an interest in supporting his national currency. Every one would feel himself liable for it, and to distrust it would be to throw discredit on his own solvency and integrity. The Treasury notes would be uniform in value, and a convenient medium for all purposes and in all the States. They had their origin in war, and they should at least be used to work off the financial consequences of the war, if not to become a perpetual currency. Then our legal-tender currency would be cheap, safe, and democratic.

But our Government should furnish an abundant currency; that is, a supply commensurate with all its uses. We have not money enough. In a speech made in this House March 29, 1874, I showed from carefully-prepared statistics from official documents that the paper used as currency in the United States on the 31st of August, 1865, amounted to $2,192,395,627, and that the total amount in actual circulation on the 1st of July, 1873, was $631,488,676, making a reduction in eight years of $1,560,906,851, which was swallowed up in the bonded debt of the country. Here was almost a vertical fall of the currency from its appalling height of expansion down to the inadequate sum of $631,488,676, since increased to about $660,000,000 by the release of a part of the reserves under the act of June, 1874. And as I said in the same speech, this sum is to answer what purpose?

To spread over illimitable territory; to distribute among forty-five million people; to furnish money for the sales of capital or wealth, amounting now to about $40,000,000,000; to pay national, State, county, city, corporation, and individual indebtedness amounting to $9,000,000,000; to pay for the marketable proportion of annual productions of all sorts, $10,000,000,000; to pay annual taxation, United States, State, county, and town, $611,000,000; to pay interest on the public debt and private debt, $500,000,000; to pay for the annual construction and operation of railroads in the United States, $1,000,000,000; to pay for annual imports into the United States, $642,000,000; to pay for the support of schools, colleges, churches, book-concerns, newspapers, for building houses and towns, founding new States, and to pay for the personal expenses of the millions that move every day upon the railroads and public thoroughfares, $500,000,000.

The currency outstanding is entirely insufficient to float these almost fabulous demands. The Government contracted its currency, but did not contract its debt, so that it now requires three times the quantity of productions to pay the debts of the State and Federal Governments and the debts and taxes of individuals that it did before the contraction. It was the absolute perversion of all economic rules to run down the contraction-screws upon a debt-burdened and tax-ridden people. The result is a wide-spread financial distress, without the fault of the people, but by the act of the Government. It was not a financial calamity which follows as a punishment for uncalculating recklessness in bubble speculations. The people have been made "to reap the whirlwind" of financial folly which the Government has turned loose upon them.

What would have been thought of the justice or equity which would have compelled the payment in greenbacks of debts contracted in contemplation of payment in confederate treasury notes which were not worth one-tenth of their value? The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Thorington vs. Smith declared against such unconscionable iniquity. The same objection would obtain to compel the payment in gold of debts contracted in contemplation of payment in greenbacks. This is what the Government has been striving with "might and main" to do. As a result, every impartial observer can see that every industry has become stagnant, our prosperity has been blighted, our progress retarded, and our people distressed. The people want more money, they demand more money, and sooner or later they will have it. Give them $500,000,000 more in reasonable installments in legal-tender notes, and it will not be more than enough to make our dormant industries heave and move with new vitality. Add $500,000,000 to our present currency, and it will not make more than half as much circulation as we had in 1865, and it will not make more than the people are owing the national banks at this time. Our currency should increase with the ratio of our national development.

But how shall we get an increase of our currency? How did we lose it? It was sunk in five-twenty and other bonds. Let the bonds payable in "dollars" give back the currency. Let these bonds be paid off in legal-tender notes according to contract. The currency, once turned loose, would flow into the channels of industry like water emptied from the clouds. This would answer the double purpose of furnishing an increase of currency and arresting interest on the public debt—a double measure of relief. And why not pay these bonds in legal-tender notes? They are made a legal tender, and say so on their face, for all debts, public and private, "except duties on imports and interest on the public debt," and the principal of the bond is neither. Besides, the holders of the bonds have already received over $1,200,000,000 interest in gold. These notes were good enough to pay off all the soldiers and seamen who fought the battles of the country; good enough to pay the farmer for his productions, which fed the Army; good enough to pay the manufacturer for the fabrics which clothed the Army; good enough for the mechanic who furnished wagons and implements for the use of the Army; good enough for the people to pay their debts and internal taxes; good enough for the States to pay their bonds and their officers who administer their governments; good enough to pay the President and all other officers of the United States; good enough to pay the pensions of the maimed and crippled soldiers who gave their missing legs and arms and eyeballs to their country—and they ought to be good enough to pay the bondholder according to contract, particularly as the original consideration of those bonds was a depreciated currency. Why should he be fed upon a different "meat" from others, and be permitted to convert our national calamities into a luxury for himself?

Such distinguished favors will be a temptation to the money kings in the future to stir up civil and foreign wars, that they may amass wealth at the expense of enslaving the people with taxation. The blaze of war will be only as Aladdin's lamp, to lead them on to fabulous treasures. It is by the logic of taxation that they teach the people the blessing of a public debt. They manage to throw the national debt on the consumption of the country, while they escape with their property from the burden. In Great Britain, as in our own country, it is not the tax on property which pays the national debt, but four-fifths of it are paid by the toiling millions in the consumption of goods charged with customs and excises.

What aggravates the curse of our public debt is that a large portion of it is a foreign debt; and it is now proposed to accumulate the curse by making the debt larger. We should cut loose from it as from a "body of death." As I have already shown, it will be a disturbing element to our financial system and national prosperity as long as it exists. The interest on it will soon eat up our mountains of gold. We may arrest the evil by paying the bonds not calling for coin in their terms in legal-tender notes. Then we can keep our gold at home, and in gold redeem our legal-tender notes. This would be the solution of the perplexing problem of equating the value of currency and coin, without placing the country under the golden yoke of a bond aristocracy.

But we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury "that there is a large amount of currency in excess of the legitimate needs of business;" and as proof he points to the interest rates in the city of New York, being "3.8 per cent. on call loans and 6.4 per cent. on commercial paper." The Secretary does himself and the country great injustice. He seems to think that the whole country is dropsical with money because it is apoplectic in New York. If he had looked truly into the matter, he would have discovered that while that great financial head was gorged, the body and limbs were wasting with "pining atrophy." He could see our great financial question as only embracing in its outlines "call loans and commercial paper." The country admits and complains of the unfair and illegitimate concentration of the currency in New York. The chill of the panic of 1873 was still on the city, and it was afraid to let its money flow out of sight lest it could not be commanded in the twinkling of an eye.

If the Secretary had crossed the river into New Jersey, my information is that he would have found that money could be lent on good real estate security at from 10 to 15 per cent. per annum. If he had gone through the fourteen Southern and Southwestern States, he would have found that money could have been readily taken at from 10 to 25 per cent. on good security. He would have found a shrinkage in the price of property in those States from 50 to 500 per cent. compared with prices in 1860. He would have found, upon a just estimate, one hundred thousand houses and lots and parcels of land within twelve months had been levied on for distress sales to pay taxes within those States. He would have found a dead lock to nearly all improvements, public and private. He should have known that the debts of the country, public and private, and the taxes of the Federal and State Governments are fivefold greater than they ever were before, and there is not money to pay them. His own report shows a deficiency in the sinking fund and balance of interest due on the public debt, making together nearly $30,000,000. He must have known that there was a falling off in the customs duties last year of $24,985,689.01, and the Treasurer of the United States in his report said in relation to the falling off:

The people, in consequence of the stringency in the money market, became more economical in their expenditures for foreign goods.

He must have known the opinion of President Grant declared in his message to the last session of Congress:

In view of the great actual contraction which has taken place in the currency, and the comparative contraction continuously going on, due to the increase of population, increase of manufactories, and all the industries, I do not believe there is too much of it now for the dullest period of the year.

The Secretary should have known that "hard times" were on the rampage, and a million of witnesses would have testified that such money stringency had not been known "within the recollection of the oldest inhabitants."

The interest on money in New York will tumble still lower, unless the currency becomes more abundant in the country. For the want of money the people cannot buy the usual supplies of merchandise. This cuts down the sales, and is followed by a reduction of stock by the jobbing and importing merchants, who could not pay a high rate of interest to support a declining business. The cry of distress will yet ring louder through the land and thunder for relief at the doors of Congress, unless appeased with a timely supply of money.

But I must draw my protracted remarks to a close. Our country is prophetic of a marvelous development. Within thirty years nearly one hundred millions of people will be sheltered under the canopy of the American Constitution. He has a puerile conception of the use of money who would confine it to the exchange and purchase of merchandise. Money is a most powerful factor in working out our national destiny. Money is not only a medium of exchange, but it is a tool in the hands of labor and the harness of our national industries by which they toil up to the grandeur of national prosperity. Money is also reproductive in its qualities. Hear a little of the mother wisdom of Benjamin Franklin:

Remember that money is of a prolific, generating nature. Money can beget money, and its offspring can beget more, and so on. Five shillings turned is six; turned again it is seven and threepence; and so on till it becomes a hundred pounds. The more there is of it, the more it produces every turning, so that the profits rise quicker and quicker. He that kills a breeding sow destroys all her offspring to the thousandth generation. He that murders a crown destroys all that it might have produced, even scores of pounds.

Scarcity of money will give the accidental money power control over the labor, property, and industries of the country. The bondholder, who sunk his money in the public debt of the country and deprived it of its powers of increase, is as culpable as the unfaithful servant who hid his lord's money in the earth. His money should have been brought out to work among our thousand industries, and if it could not have found employment on the land, it would have found ample vent in our commerce upon the seas. There is no danger of our country being afflicted with financial elephantiasis with a boundless continent to subdue, to populate, to improve, and to adorn. We have yet worked out only a small fraction of our development. The whole country has yet to be filled with permanent capital, which must be accumulated by the use of money as the product of labor and other capital. Lands have to be purchased and prepared for cultivation—houses built, work-beasts, breeding stock, and farming implements provided—towns, cities, railroads, canals, mills, public buildings, schools, colleges, churches, and all other improvements have to be constructed and form a part of our national capital. Our annual productions then would baffle all our calculations. When our country is thus filled with capital, abounding with labor, and burdened with productions, still let the money accumulate, flow into, and fill every channel of industry until it brims with repletion, and still the money tide must rise until it overflows the national limits, if we would reach the climax of national prosperity, such as God promised to the ancient Hebrews:

Thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow.

Belligerent Rights—Free Cuba.

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. HAGANS,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 6, 1875,

On the following joint resolution introduced by him January 18, 1875:

"Whereas the heroic struggle of the insurgents on the island of Cuba has excited the sympathy of the civilized nations of the world, and has been maintained for a period of time sufficient, according to the customs and practices of civilized governments, to entitle the insurrectionary government of that island to be accorded belligerent rights in the manner and under the rules known to the law of nations: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the sense of this Congress that a recognition of said insurrectionary government should be made by the Government of the United States so far as to bring hostilities in that island within the rules known to civilized warfare."

Mr. HAGANS. Mr. Speaker, of all the nations of the globe, ours is the one which, by reason of its own origin, of its history, of all its most sacred traditions, of the fundamental ideas of its government, is under the most lasting obligations, both by reason and sentiment, to sympathize with any people struggling for the rights and liberties which the philosophy of the age has pronounced to be common to all men. Whenever a people propose to throw off a despotism, or undertake to relieve themselves from the evils of government based upon hereditary claims or mere "authority," and establish a system founded upon popular sovereignty, and where they show that their movement is in reality popular and not unreasonable discontent, they have a claim upon the American people for sympathy, and upon the great American Republic for recognition. And, I think, sir, that since the establishment of the American nation through the war of our glorious Revolution, no people, whether in the eastern or western hemisphere, has sought to overthrow despotic power and to interweave popular rights in their institutions, which has not found its best arguments and the source of its highest eloquence in the history, the example, the men, and the ideas of America. The philosophic historian of the future, in recounting the scenes and incidents of the age, can but record that nowhere in Europe or America has despotic power been curtailed of its cruel demands and freedom gained a victory, save through the almost irresistible aid and example of the fathers of our Republic. By this sign have the nations conquered rulers; by this sign do peoples go forth to freedom's feasts.

If this position be conceded, and the great Republic of the western world can be justly regarded as the grand example among the nations struggling for free institutions, can it be otherwise than our plain duty to carefully examine into the facts concerning every movement of the oppressed in whatsoever land or in whatsoever clime it may occur? But, above all, is it not an imperative duty when the event arises within the borders of a realm from whence the cries of appeal come to our shores on the breath of every morning breeze? The chief Executive of the nation has responded to the call, and has, so far as is consistent with his high position, formally called the attention of the country to the insurrection in Cuba, an insurrection which has maintained a formidable strength during many years. In his annual message to Congress at the beginning of the present session he says:

The deplorable strife in Cuba continues without any marked change in the relative advantages of the contending forces. The insurrection continues, but Spain has gained no superiority. Six years of strife give to the insurrection a significance which cannot be denied. Its duration and the tenacity of its adherence, together with the absence of manifested power of suppression on the part of Spain, cannot be controverted, and may make some positive steps on the part of other powers a matter of self-necessity. I had confidently hoped at this time to be able to announce the arrangement of some of the important questions between this Government and that of Spain, but the negotiations have been protracted. The unhappy intestine dissensions of Spain command our profound sympathy, and must be accepted as perhaps a cause of some delay. An early settlement, in part at least, of the questions between the Governments is hoped. In the mean time, awaiting the results of immediately pending negotiations, I defer a further and fuller communication on the subject of the relations of this country and Spain.

These, sir, are words of great moderation. They are in fact the manifestation of a sublime patience on the part of the American Government which the nations of Europe that maintain different forms of government from our own cannot have failed to observe. They are also, when fully considered, a demonstration of the sublime faith of America in republican institutions. The people of this Republic are not unobservant spectators of the heroic struggles of the Cuban patriots, and the inaction hitherto maintained by them can only be attributed to the most singular and interesting conjuncture of affairs in that country from whose remorseless tyranny these patriots would be free.

Let us, sir, examine into that condition for a few moments. After years of grinding despotism, cruel government, and endurance of rulers whose gross and shameless licentiousness was flaunted in the face of Christendom, the people of Spain revolted against their disreputable monarchy and declared their government to be republican. At the head of it for a time was one of the most illustrious statesmen and pure and exalted patriots of the age, Emilio Castelar. This remarkable man, while perhaps the most eloquent orator of his time, is also a versatile and brilliant author. There are few, if any, more profound thinkers now connected with the conduct of human affairs. Though his eloquence is like that of the heroic ages, as illustrated by the "resistless tide" of Demosthenes in the ancient world and the irresistible power of our own Patrick Henry, he is nevertheless one of the most practical of statesmen; so that if it were practicable for Spain now to be republican, she could be so chiefly by the surpassing genius of Emilio Castelar. Beyond all this, the chord that must call forth the tuneful harmony in the American heart is his devotion to freedom in the emancipation of every human being from the blighting curse of slavery. While under the guiding hand of such a central figure, so pre-eminent in nobility and statesmanship, Spain was struggling against fearful odds, which need not be mentioned, but which must strike the commonest apprehension, America could take no active steps that would impede or embarrass a struggle so fraught with precious germs for the future government and well-being of mankind. I have, therefore, no words of condemnation for the sublime patience which our people or authorities have shown in respect to Cuban affairs, nor for the sublime faith manifested in respect to the establishment of republican government in Spain. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a limit to forbearance even should it lead to conflict. Our patience, while woes unutterable have been perpetrated in the island of Cuba, and our faith in republics and republican institutions have secured for us the right of moral interference in the affairs of that most unhappy people.

One sentiment in connection with the subject has been submerged by the tide of affairs since the language of the President's message, from which I have read, was received by Congress—the republic of Spain has crumbled into ruins and passed out of existence. In its stead we see again that monarchy which has made so many mistakes and shed so much blood. It is a remarkable but perhaps a natural retrogradation of the Spanish nation, yet it reverses the whole aspect of the Spanish-Cuban question as viewed from the western stand-point. Where predilection hitherto encouraged all the legitimate moral aid and comfort from the American people to republican Spain, it is now no less clearly our duty to give all the legitimate moral aid in our power to republican Cuba as against monarchical Bourbon Spain. If the situation at the time of the transmission of the President's message justified his temperate and moderate language, is it not certain that the changed situation now demands that our Government should at once take a firm attitude, if not in recognition of the indepence of Cuba, at least in recognition of the belligerent rights of the revolutionists? Has the hour not arrived in which to throw the weight of the moral influence of the United States in behalf of free Cuba.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, in order that we may arrive at correct conclusions as to the duty of the American Government in this important question, to speak of the subject in its general bearings, beginning first, in general terms, with—

SPANISH ACQUISITIONS IN AMERICA.

The history of Spanish conquests in the western hemisphere may be described as a record of avarice, cruelty, bigotry, and lust nowhere else paralleled or even approached in the annals of mankind. If the great discoverer Columbus himself did not set the example of treachery, cruelty, and bloodthirstiness, it must be remembered that he was not a Spaniard but an Italian. He himself who gave to Spain a new world was made the victim, by that people and government, of contumely, cruel injustice, and atrocious ingratitude. We have but to carefully study the lesson given to us by the great sculptor on the door of our Rotunda to learn the ignominy which Spain meted out to him who had conferred the most illustrious renown upon the Spanish monarchy. From that day forth until Spanish rulers were generally expelled from the countries of the western hemisphere, Spanish-American history is a record of cruelty and crime, and has been branded as such with an indelible stigma by the most celebrated of both American and European writers. If there indeed be a parallel to the perfidious cunning, the cold-blooded cruelty, the wholesale massacre of unarmed men shown in the Spanish conquests of America, it can be found only in the dark and bloody and murderous history of the Spaniards of the Netherlands. It would be a "damning spot" in any nation to have produced one Alva; but Spain has produced many, and, most lamentable of all, has gloried in their monstrous deeds. The story of her deeds is in no instance, however, nor has the unvarying tale of outrage and of shame received a more horrible illustration than is to be found in her dealings with Cuba, "the gem of the Antilles."

It is not necessary for me to enter into a chronological account of events in Cuba, as the historian would do in narrating its history. This is the province of other fields of human inquiry and reflection. Statemanship has to do with general facts. It acts upon the existing state of things, and has to do with the past only as a light to guide it in present action, and to prepare reasonable precautions and safeguards against the threatened dangers and ills of the future. "I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided," said the great orator of the Revolution, "and that is the lamp of experience." Let us see what rays this lamp will shed upon Spanish domination in Cuba, so that thereby we may be enabled wisely to determine what is our duty for the present and the future welfare of the people of Cuba and those of the United States. Who can doubt that the history of Spanish domination in Cuba has been from the beginning a curse to that island, a hinderance to the cause of civilization, and an unwarrantable interference by a European power with the rightful freedom and independence of American peoples? I assert that so far from there having been any advance in political science in harmony with the spirit of the age, even as evidenced by the improved condition of the race in all monarchies save Spain, the dealings with Cuba by the home government have represented an era covered by the moldy execrations of centuries, and made insurrections righteous and resistance obedience to Deity. I trust it will not be regarded as unpatriotic, when I declare that the wrongs of the Cuban patriots find more warrant in fact, more warrant in general law and natural right, for their attitude against Spanish domination than the American people had when they declared almost a century ago that they were, and were of right entitled to be, free and independent States.

There are three words, sir, in which the history of Spanish domination in Cuba, and in all her other colonial dependencies, might well be summed up. They are: Inhumanity; slavery; ferocity. From the beginning Cuba has been a colonial orange which Spain has been constantly squeezing. The people have been taxed with a colossal enormity, and the revenues of the island have been used to sustain an effete and licentious dynasty abroad, and corrupt, pampered task-masters at home. That the largest revenues might be drawn from her bleeding side, the African slave-trade was openly carried on by Spain longer than any other nation, and was clandestinely engaged in by Spanish grandees of the island for years after the mother country had been forced by the moral sentiment of Christendom to denounce the inhuman practice in the solemn stipulations of treaties.

In the same wrongful interest, and for the same barbarous purpose, all the just rules of national comity have been violated in her commercial regulations with respect to Cuba. A heavy tribute is laid upon everything which enters her ports or departs therefrom; and all this in direct antagonism to Cuban industries and in the interest of the Spanish budget.

But, sir, the material welfare of Cuba and her people is not the only just cause of complaint, nor the only means of unjust discrimination. There is scarcely a principle of civilized, not to say free, government which is not daily and hourly violated on her soil; and there is no act of savage barbarity which is not being constantly committed by the Spanish authorities, civil and military. Is there a man in this House; nay more, is there a citizen of the country, who was not struck almost dumb with astonishment and horror when the news of the fatal massacre of the officers of the Virginius first reached our shores? It matters not what one might have thought of that unhappy enterprise—and it is scarcely necessary for me to deny that it was unlawful—we could not have contemplated the untimely taking off, and the mode of its brutal execution, without feelings of indignation and detestation. Sir, such things have been of daily occurrence in Cuba for many long years, and it would seem that deeds which horrify all other people are matters of calm contemplation and joyous gratulation to the masters of Cuba. They seem to be the iconoclasts of freedom, of human progress, and of liberal civilization.

This, Mr. Speaker, is believed to be no overdrawn picture, and applies with equal force to Spanish history in all of its American affairs. The pages of our Prescott teem with the revolting recitals, and the fascinating volumes of our American Motley demonstrate that no pen can overdraw and no tongue can overstate the measure of Spanish cruelty and perfidy during the last four hundred years. Mankind looks to her for cruel attacks upon all modern ideas as certainly as they expect free trade among British statesman, art in Italy, military prowess in Germany, agitation in France.

The original settlement of the island of Cuba, it will be remembered, was brought about by the Spaniards by the commission of two unmitigated crimes: First, the extinction of the original population, save the remnants of a few hardy tribes in the mountainous regions, by overwork as the enforced slaves of the Spaniards; and, second, the opening and extension of the African slave-trade for the purpose of replacing these poor Indians thus literally done to death by the remorseless avarice of cruel adventurers. The Spanish power had its origin in Cuba in these two foul crimes against humanity; and when it is said that from that day until the present the history of Spanish domination in the Antilles has been constantly worthy of its origin, enough is said to show that it is entitled not to the respect but to the execration of civilized mankind. From the time when the native population had been thus practically exterminated up to the year 1762, sixty thousand slaves had been imported from Africa. From the latter period until the year 1789, about thirty thousand more were imported. At this last date the slave-trade was declared free by Spanish law—the only instance, perhaps, in the history of civilization, except in the case of the notorious "Lecompton constitution," where law has positively declared, in express terms, that man could have property in man. From 1789 down to a very recent date Cuba was the principal support of this infamous traffic. And to this day the Spanish rulers of the island and the Catalonian volunteers who riot in Cuba look upon the prohibition of the slave-trade by the Christian nations of the world as a wrongful interference with their rights and profits.

What has been the character of these rulers? In the whole history of the island there have been but two or three reputable captains-general; no more. All the others have governed with the sole object of extorting from the people all possible revenue for Spain and all possible profit for themselves. Indeed it has passed into the proverbs of the language, that five years only is sufficient to amass a stupendous fortune as captain-general in Cuba. Gentlemen may conclude for themselves how lamentable must have been the history of such a country. It can be no matter for wonder that there has been little literature or eloquence and no art. All the qualities which ennoble man have been there repressed. And I hold it as a complete demonstration of the high standard in morals and intellectual attributes of the Cuban peoples that, notwithstanding the terrible government by which they have been ever oppressed, they are generally intelligent, chivalric, and brave. Among them now—I mean among the Cuban revolutionists—are men learned in the professions, able writers and orators, skillful in the art of war, and self-sacrificing in their devotion to the disenthrallment of their country.

What is the present status of the Cuban revolution? What was at first generally called "the Cuban insurrection" originated in the year 1868. In the summer of that year several leading Cubans, men of wealth, character, and standing in society, met together and perfected a plan of revolution. In the scheme to which they agreed there were two leading objects in view, each one of which was entitled to the favorable judgment of mankind. These were: the independence of Cuba and the emancipation of the blacks. Many conferences of the friends of these measures were held, and it was at last determined to rise in armed rebellion against Spanish domination in the month of November. Meantime the cause daily gained new adherents, particularly in the eastern portions of the island. Events precipitated the revolution quicker than had been agreed upon, and a conflict of arms between the patriots and Spanish troops occurred in the month of October. From the month of October, 1868, therefore, to the present moment, the Cuban "insurrectionists" as they are called by the home government, but "revolutionists" as they must in justice be denominated, have made more or less formidable head against the government of foreigners. They have three army corps, amounting in all to about twelve thousand men. At one time they had in the field a mobilized army of well-trained and well-equipped soldiers numbering ten thousand three hundred men. At this hour there are more than this in arms against the government. Let us not underrate or underestimate this force. Comparing the population of the two countries, our own revolutionary army was not relatively so large, and no American will quietly permit the heroes of 1776 to be insignificantly denominated "insurrectionists."

In consequence of the topographical features of the country, of the military forces opposed to them, and certain circumstances upon which I need not dwell, the patriots have pursued a mode of warfare in small bodies, as a general rule of strategy. It has not been wise policy for them to concentrate their forces. Nevertheless, considerable patriot armies have frequently met equal or greater forces of Spaniards or volunteers, and have fought pitched battles with them. On several occasions they have gained notable victories, and they have everywhere manifested a devotion to freedom, a gallantry in conflict, and a moderation in victory in pleasing contrast to the habitual conduct of their oppressors. From the beginning of the contest they have deserved the moral support of mankind.

I admit, sir, freely that we are to investigate and consider this question not alone from the moral and humane point of view, but must examine it in its legal aspects. Are the Cuban patriots entitled to the recognition of the American Government as belligerents? This question will be answered to a great extent by examining whether they are representative of the Cuban people. If they are, now that they have successfully maintained war for more than six years, they are entitled to such recognition from all governments, most especially from ours. Spanish domination in Cuba has always been an outrage upon Cuban rights, both of person and property, and has always been maintained by force alone. There has never been any right, abstractly speaking, in it. It is not too much to say that it is a constant affront to modern political civilization. It is as if Alva were slaying with the sword and carrying the torch of devastation in the Netherlands in the nineteenth century. It is a horrid anachronism. That such may be known to be the truth, let a few plain facts be stated.

In ordinary times, before the revolution was inaugurated, about twenty thousand Spanish troops were regularly stationed in Cuba. There was the disciplined militia besides, always ready for instant call to arms. The Spanish navy in Cuban waters was never less than from twenty-five to thirty war vessels, carrying over two hundred guns and three thousand men. Since the revolution it has been increased by about thirty light-draught gun-boats, which protect the coast against any aid to the patriots which might be sent from abroad. Why this immense military power? Here is a standing army for a million and a half of people about as great in numbers as our own regular Army, nearly all of which is engaged in guarding our great western frontier. There are no savage tribes in Cuba. This great military and naval force is there to uphold the hateful domination of Spain. Without it that power could not last beyond the hour of the setting sun.

How has this military array exercised itself upon the patriots of Cuba, struggling no less heroically for freedom and independence than did our own ancestors, to whom we gladly accord eternal honors? Since 1870 the regular troops have numbered about twenty-five thousand, the expeditionary corps thirty-three thousand more, and the militia in active service four thousand additional; in all numbering more than sixty thousand in the field, besides seventy thousand "volunteers," the most detested of all the Spanish soldiery in Cuba, in garrison. Here is a standing army, as we may in general terms call it, of more than one hundred and thirty thousand men. Such is the tremendous force by which freedom and independence in Cuba are repressed. How, I asked a moment ago, is this force exercised? Generally, I may say, as Spain has always exercised power, with perfidious and shocking cruelty. I have already referred to the barbarous haste with which the officers of the Virginius were butchered. This cruel act brought a shock to all mankind.

But this is only one instance of the general conduct of Spanish Cuban rule. Eminent American citizens, and the sons of eminent statesmen of our country, have been made to suffer death in Cuba in the most ignominious manner. Who can forget the bloody proclamation of Captain-General Valmaseda against the present revolutionists, in which he declared that every male over fifteen years of age found in the country away from his home should be shot; that every house on which a white flag was not displayed should be burned; and that all women and children found alone on their plantations should be removed to certain designated cities. The fearful atrocities of the volunteers in January, 1869, committed in the capital of the country by the indiscriminate shooting of men, women, and children, which were subsequently sustained by the government, are a stain upon the world. The whole, indeed, is one long tale of horrors. Here is a summing up of this dark story for three years, which I find in a work universally recognized as authority:

According to official reports forwarded to Madrid by the United States minister, thirteen thousand and six hundred Cubans had been killed in battle up to August, 1873, besides forty-three thousand and five hundred prisoners whom the Spanish minister admitted to have been put to death.

Here is a shocking picture indeed! It is admitted by the Spanish minister that fifty-seven thousand and one hundred Cubans had been killed in three years of their revolution, forty-three thousand and five hundred of them having been murdered. No other word can fitly describe this most heinous outrage. And still, sir, the "insurrection" is not suppressed. The same terrible cruelties have been in active existence since August, 1873. Every month quite a number of prisoners of war are "put to death." The number at this time has probably reached sixty thousand souls. How long can our Government and our people permit such hitherto unknown crimes to be committed without entering our solemn protest? Are the wretched Cubans to be again exterminated before the nations cry out against the woes she is now enduring?

It is conclusive, I think, sir, from the above statistics that the revolutionists do represent the people, and that the Spaniards are intruders. Otherwise the insurrection, if it were a mere insurrection, would have been long since repressed, and peace, even though it were the peace of death, would have been restored. That it is a genuine revolution sustained by the people is undoubtedly true, and their claims for belligerent recognition are full as great, if not indeed stronger, than were those of our forefathers under like circumstances when their belligerency was promulgated by the powers of Europe. In proportion to population the Cubans have more men in the field than they, have fought as many battles, won as many victories, and have suffered more by pillage and hunger, devastation and want, exile and death.

Their cause does not rest here, Mr. Speaker. There are still other powerful considerations in behalf of their recognition as belligerents at our hands, and to some of these I will invite the attention of the House.

I affirm that the Cuban patriots are entitled to recognition by the law of nations. I do not propose to enter into any elaborate discussion of the principles of the law of nations bearing upon this case. Such learned discussions are more appropriately conducted, as it seems to me, in the field of diplomacy than here. I desire, however, to make the application of a principle in the international code which is announced by all the great authoritative writers on the subject, and will not doubtless be questioned here or elsewhere. The purport of this principle, as it is propounded by all the recognized authorities, is this: That where a population sustains a government in hostility to the established authority until it attracts the sympathy of the world by its valor and determination to be free, and evinces its ability to maintain its opposition during a considerable period of time, it ought to be so far recognized as to be brought within the rules of civilized warfare by a guarantee of belligerent rights. This is an understatement of the scope of the principle rather than an overstatement; and I believe that under circumstances as thus stated a sovereign nation would be wholly justifiable in recognizing a people so described as possessing a government of their own.

Perhaps, sir, that instance of the recognition of a revolutionary government by other powers in modern times which approaches more nearly the case of Cuba, was the recognition of the Greek revolution by the powers of Europe in 1827. This is expressly approved both by Wheaton and Woolsey, confessedly the most eminent of American writers on international law. Says Woolsey:

In modern times the interference of Great Britain, France, and Russia, on behalf of the Greeks in 1827, was avowedly dictated by motives of humanity. The Greeks, after a bloody contest, had so far achieved their independence that the Sultan could not reduce them. Accordingly his vassal, Mehemet Ali, of Egypt, was allowed to send an army of subjugation into the Morea, and the atrocious scenes of fanatical war were renewed. The Greeks applied to France and England for help or mediation. At length, in consequence of the battle of Navarino, October 20, 1827, and the French occupation of the Morea, the peninsula was evacuated by Mohammedan troops, and finally the independence of Greece was acknowledged.

Mr. Wheaton, in his Elements of International Law, says of these events, and he is quoted and approved by President Woolsey, that—

The Christian powers of Europe were eminently justified in their interference to rescue a whole nation not merely from religious persecution, but from the cruel alternative of being transported from their native land or exterminated by their oppressors. The rights of human nature wantonly outraged by this cruel warfare were but tardily and imperfectly vindicated by this measure. "Whatever," as Sir James Mackintosh said, "a nation may lawfully defend for itself it may defend for another people, if called upon to interpose." The interference of the Christian powers to put an end to this bloody contest might, therefore, have been safely rested upon this ground alone, without appealing to the interests of commerce and of the repose of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, there was no one argument in behalf of the recognition of the independence of the Greeks in 1827 which does not apply with greater force to the Cubans of 1875. The Greeks had not held out so long against the Turk as the Cubans have maintained themselves against the Spaniard. Not half so many of them had been so inhumanly slain in cold blood. They had not proclaimed the principles of liberty so emphatically and unreservedly. They had not fought with more gallantry nor endured with more fortitude. They were, it is true, the descendants of a great and glorious race; of a race which had done more than any other to illustrate the greatness of the human mind, and to make for it the sublimest records in poetry, in eloquence, in sculpture, in architecture, and in song. On this account the sympathies of mankind were greatly stirred in behalf of the Greek revolutionists. The most illustrious poet of England then living escaped from the embraces of beauty and the voluptuous elegance of wealth to aid the Greeks, and there gloriously ended his brilliant and erratic life. One of our own lyrics sprang from the same inspiring theme. Clay, and Webster, and other of our great orators and statesmen rarely spoke with more power and eloquence than when they poured out their rich gifts in behalf of the Greek revolution. I beg to say, with all deference to the riper experience and more mature reflection of others, whether in the past or present, that neither humanity, nor liberty, nor Christian civilization was in the smallest degree more insulted and outraged by the Turks in Greece than all have been insulted and outraged by the Spaniards in Cuba during the whole history of the island, and especially since the month of October, 1868. As the best writers on the law of nations unite in telling us that interference in Greece was perfectly justifiable on the score of humanity alone, so I hold the proposition to be invulnerable to just criticism in the position I feel warranted in assuming, that the American Government should at once recognize the belligerent rights of the Cuban revolutionists. If our Government should go further and recognize their independence, it would have ample and well-grounded reasons to sustain it in the recognized principles of international law. But so much as this I do not now insist upon.

Let us inquire for a moment into the precedents in such cases as the one now presented, and see whether by the light of comparison the Government would be justifiable in taking the course I advocate. In the age which succeeded the religious reformation in Europe, writers on international law expressly tell us that religious sympathies induced Protestant countries to aid each other against the superior might of the Catholic, and to aid the votaries of their faith within Catholic states in order to secure for them religious freedom. Says Wheaton:

The great Catholic and Protestant powers mutually protected the adherents of their own faith in the bosom of rival states. The repeated interference of Austria and Spain in favor of the Catholic faction in France, Germany, and England, and of the Protestant powers to protect their persecuted brethren in Germany, France, and the Netherlands, gave a peculiar coloring to the political transactions of the age. This was still more heightened by the conduct of Catholic France under the ministry of Cardinal Richelieu, in sustaining, by a singular refinement of policy, the Protestant princes and people of Germany against the house of Austria, while she was persecuting with unrelenting severity her own subjects of the reformed faith. (Elements of International Law, page 93.)

Those who have given themselves the intellectual pleasure of reading the works of Motley well know how the great Queen of England made armed interference in behalf of the Dutch in their long and heroic struggles with Spain. The energetic threats of Cromwell against the persecutors of the Waldenses had a notable influence in curbing the cruelty of the Duke of Savoy. I might give many other instances of interference on account of religion and humanity, but it is not necessary.

To the principle of the recognition of revolutionary governments when reasonably successful, the American Government is peculiarly indebted. But for the recognition of American independence by France and other European powers, and the armed interference of the former in our behalf, it is certain that our revolutionary struggle would have been indefinitely protracted. The Government of the United States is the child of the very principle which, in modified and liberal form, I am advocating as applicable to the Cuban revolution.

The republic of Mexico and the states of Central and South America are illustrations of the same truth. After the revolted colonies of Spain in the western world had for some time made head against the established government in their endeavor to institute republics in the place of monarchical dependencies, and when Spain undertook to procure the assistance of European governments to put down these revolutions, both Great Britain and the United States energetically protested against the right of the allied powers to interfere by forcible means. Hence the South American republics were successful; and after many heroic acts, challenging the admiration of the world, were admitted into the family of nations. If some of them have not been all the while since so well governed as they might have been, if the bright anticipations of the friends of freedom have not all been realized, still it can be triumphantly asserted that by these memorable events humanity and freedom gained substantial victories. If Cuba had then been wrested from the domination of Spain, as was greatly desired and openly advocated by the friends of republics in South America, it would perhaps have been far better for the people of the western world and in the end for mankind. There was then left in the West a remnant of kingly power, the influence of which has been only evil and that continually. However this may be, and I will recur to this point again in a moment, we shall find if we trace the history of the republics of South America that in no single instance was there as much cause for revolt as there has been constantly and now is in Cuba; that in no instance was the revolution shown to be more decisively a popular movement, numbers being taken into consideration; that in no instance were more just principles of government proclaimed by the revolutionists; nor was the contest of arms more bravely conducted. It is confidently asserted that, where one good reason or just ground for the recognition of the South American republics existed, tenfold stronger arguments appeal upon behalf of Cuba.

Mr. Speaker, out of these renowned contests for liberty on the part of the revolted colonies of Spain in the western world there arose a distinctive American doctrine of governmental policy. It was then that the Government of the United States declared that it should consider any attempt on the part of the allied European powers to extend their peculiar political system to the American continent as dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States. It was further declared by the then President of the Republic that with the existing colonies or dependencies of any European powers in America they had not interfered and would not interfere, but with respect to the governments whose independence they had recognized, they could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any manner their destiny, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. (See Wheaton's Elements of International Law, page 97.)

This is the Monroe doctrine, and it has become the traditional policy of the United States. In the abstract principle, this doctrine means that European political institutions are not suitable to America. It gives no welcome to monarchy or aristocracy. I agree that to this doctrine with its explanatory phrases the existence of Spanish domination in Cuba is not repugnant. But the existence of that domination, there, is in opposition to the principle upon which this traditional policy of the United States is founded. It is clear that the United States ought to be quick rather than slow in recognizing republics in the western hemisphere.

I hold, sir, to the Monroe doctrine in its broadest signification and widest application. It is a logical result of American freedom and civilization, and is a necessity for the political regeneration and progress of mankind. Liberal doctrines are a demand of the times. The superstitions, the political shams of other ages are not for this continent. They should be banished herefrom; every relic of mere authority, every vestige of the blasphemous pretense of jure divino, every sentiment of hereditary claim. For such things the American continent should have no permanent abiding-place.

Nothing, sir, in this age of progress stands still, not even a doctrine. It is constantly receiving new applications. I believe in extending the application of the Monroe doctrine. The hour has perhaps arrived when we should proclaim that kingly institutions are contrary to the genius of America, hostile to the development of American civilization, and ought not to be endured on our borders. But this doctrine should not be thrust upon peoples at the point of the bayonet or at the cannon's mouth. I urge no unfriendly interference with the affairs of other governments. With our hereditary policy of non-interference in the affairs of other nations I heartily agree. This, however, is an age of the power of public opinion, as was most forcibly and eloquently proclaimed by Mr. Webster when he advocated the recognition of the Greek revolutionary government. What he then said with so much truth and power is even more applicable to the present situation of affairs than it was at that time. Since then a grand power has gradually arisen to illumine the world, which was then in its infancy. The press with its myriad arms has literally reached intelligence to every hamlet, and almost to every home, throughout a vast portion of the whole world. There is a higher standard of intelligence in the general body-politic of every nation, in consequence of these and other incentives to mental improvement. Just how much the splendid civilization and the advance of the political science of our times is due to the influence of our own Republic can never, perhaps, be fully estimated. We know that it was immediately followed by great popular movements in Europe. The French Revolution, that terrible rebound from the enthrallment of the dark ages, was largely due to our own; and though it was accompanied by many unfortuitous scenes and events, it purified the political atmosphere of a continent, emancipated the human mind from ecclesiastical, monarchical, and aristocratic thralldom, and made that civilization possible which boasts of a Tyndall and Watson in science; Buckle and Guizot in literature; Gladstone and Bright and Cobden, and our own Lincoln, in statesmanship. Who can doubt, indeed, that to the influence of American republican institutions, in respect to resistance to authority and the assertion of individual rights, which have permeated Christendom, countless benefits have been conferred upon the race? Shall it be said that such an influence shall be "cabined, cribbed, confined?"

What are some of the practical aspects of this question? Cuba although our near neighbor, and at one time in geological history doubtless an integral part of the North American continent, has comparatively more intimate and profitable commercial relations with other nations than with ours. This fact, somewhat humiliating to our commercial activity, is to a considerable extent due to the decadence of American shipping, one of the deplorable results of the late war, and to other causes. But there are other reasons for it. These grow out of Spanish legislation; treaties between Spain and other countries, and the regulations in respect to customs in Cuba, hostile to the interests of American commerce in that island. Notwithstanding these impediments, our imports from the Spanish West Indies for the year ending June 30, 1873, were over $85,000,000, and our exports over $17,000,000, making a total annual trade of more than one hundred millions, which would have probably been increased to over one hundred and fifty millions but for the reasons to which reference has just been made. By reason of our proximity to the islands, of their productions which find so readily a market in our ports, and which are so readily exchanged for those of our own country, our trade with them ought to be every year largely in excess of the sums just named.

But I shall not occupy the time of the House with the recital of mere commercial statistics. I prefer to deal with more comprehensive generalizations. Cuba is the key to the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea. Upon these waters are the republic of Mexico and several of the states of Central America. They are upon the line of our travel and transportation by steamship and the Panama Railroad, between our Atlantic and Pacific sea-board. The commerce of all these countries on the Gulf and the Caribbean Sea and of the West Indies is more naturally tributary to the United States than to any other nation. Nevertheless we have only a small share of it all. The incipiency to our supremacy in all this commerce will be found in Cuba being in the possession of a government free and progressive in character, and entertaining fraternal sentiments by reason of having extended to it in gloomy hours words of comfort and cheer. In full accord with the law of nations; in the interest of American ideas of politics and civilization; in the interest of our trade and commerce now and for the future; in the interest of humanity and to prevent a further wanton effusion of blood, I insist on this as the time for the exercise of the great prerogative of nations in admitting a suffering people to the councils of national individuality and greatness.

Before I leave the subject of our commercial relations with the West Indies, I beg to refer for a moment to a question which was recently discussed by the American people—our acquisition of San Domingo. The underlying reason for that acquisition was never fully understood by the general public. It was not claimed by those who favored the proposition that gold flowed down the mountain slopes of the island; that the rich exuberance of nature supplied all the necessities of man without a struggle, or that the inhabitants would be altogether a desirable class of citizens. The true reason why the United States should have acquired it was, because thereby our people would have assumed a commanding position in the commerce of the West Indies, and of the neighboring Spanish-American states. Another good reason for its acquirement was to be found in the fact that the possession of San Domingo by the United States would have opened in the future a vantage ground in our honorable possession of other West Indian islands; and finally to our undivided political and commercial supremacy in this portion of the globe—a consummation most devoutly to be wished. It is a matter of regret that this acquisition was not completed when the wise statesmanship of the day proposed it, and had so far prepared the initiatory steps that but a few strokes of the pen would have settled it forever. Such opportunities are rare, and only the sagacity which peers into futurity can fully appreciate their rich importance in the passing moment.

Mr. Speaker, it will be readily perceived that if the statements I have shown are correct there are many grave and important considerations connected with what is generally known as the Cuban question. There lingers the only remaining relic of monarchy and Bourbon despotism on our continent. Everywhere else there is some form of representative government. There, for almost as long a period as Washington and his compatriots contended against the British Crown in this country, have the Cuban patriots withstood their fierce and vindictive oppressors. They have constructed a government modeled after the American Constitution. They have declared for universal emancipation. Their principles of governmental science, if they succeed, will be our principles; their civilization will be our civilization. They are our friends and brethren and they should receive the assurances of our moral support.

It may be, sir, that these people will be reduced by the Spanish Crown; it is physically possible; but that reduction will be only by extermination. This monstrous cruelty the law of nations commands the world to prohibit. About ninety thousand troops have been sent from Spain to Cuba to suppress the insurrection since October, 1868. The expenses have been to that nation nearly $70,000,000 annually, or more than four hundred millions to the present. And yet to this hour so violent is the struggle, that Spain murders the prisoners captured by her armies. These atrocities should be ended, if it can only be so done, by armed interference upon the part of Christian peoples. But the acknowledgment of belligerent rights will go far to obviate any such final resort. Nor can this be regarded as an insult or menace to Spain. All nations stand upon an equality of rights. Among these is the freedom of opinion. No nation can assume to bar the voice of another. The moment a nation deems that a revolutionary movement is entitled to belligerent rights, or indeed a more complete recognition, it has a right conceded by the voice of modern opinion and action to so declare.

Only a few more words, sir, and I am done. The Congress needs not to be assured of the American sentiment in behalf of universal liberty. It has been manifested at every period of our national existence. Never has a struggling and oppressed people sought to escape from the iron hand of despotic power, that the American heart did not beat in kindly sympathy. It was so in the great French struggle of 1789. No people were more earnest in behalf of Greek independence. No nation so heartily admired Bolivar and his heroic compeers who achieved South American independence. When popular revolutions occurred in Hungary, in Germany, in Italy, in France, in Ireland, no eyes so kindled with generous enthusiasm at victories for freedom, or saddened with news of misfortune, and no arms were so hospitably opened to receive the defeated chieftians, as were those of the worthy sons of the sires of 1776.

I appeal to this Congress to place itself in full accord with this American sentiment. The organized cruelty of Spanish rule in Cuba is an affront to the age, and its bitter malevolence is only exceeded by its hideous monstrosities. We owe it to the past, it is the duty of the present, and the future will ascribe it to our highest honor, to accord the rights acknowledged by the common laws of modern warfare to the Cuban revolutionists.

I make this appeal, sir, because I see this fair island like another Niobe of nations, with her garments dripping with the blood of her slain children; her helpless feet bathed in the bright Caribbean waters, the tears of her sorrows, and her disheveled locks rent by the fire-storm of contumely and wrongs. The very genius of destruction seems to throw its fell shadow over her broken limbs and bruised form. Even her burial is forbidden by the angry passions of her destroyers, that her misfortunes may be eternal.

Sir, one of our own great masters has hewn in immortal marble the figure of another prostrate nation. Art has contributed one of her grandest triumphs to celebrate the enthralldom of that people whose memories awaken the most sublime inspirations of the human soul. It is a form of surpassing beauty and perfection. With manacled hands it stands erect in conscious loveliness. But the lineaments of the sculptured face, as with averted head it seeks a last fond glance of the native land, betrays no pain; nor does the shadow of fear find a lodging there; nor are those delicate limbs and that chaste form marred by the stroke of wrong or stung with the arrow of unhappy fate. A deep, an almost holy resignation overspreads the countenance that turns to gaze upon the joys of the past, indifferent to the future. Sir, no such conception can portray the living Cuba. Her outward form, so lovely in the hands of its Creator, bears every impress of sorrow; her limbs are fettered in almost deathless bands; her breast is torn and bleeding from the foul grasp of her ruthless ravisher; her countenance, alas! turns not back to halcyon days and scenes of other years, for her youth was but the birth of woes.

Possessing as she does in nature's store all that makes life desirable, both in climate and in soil, in forest and in field, in mountain and in plain, in lake and in river, in ocean and in shore, she yet eats not the bread of her own toil. Robber feet press her soil, robber hands snatch the fruits of enforced labor, and robber hands wield the scourge of her afflictions. Still, sir, she is undaunted. Like her own palm, the queen of the forest, which defies the hurricane blasts that sweep over her breast and proudly dashes the storms from her peerless brow, the spirit of free Cuba is undying. It sighs in the morning breeze ladened with the aroma of her own perfumed breath. It moans its wierd, deathless hopes adown the ravines of her lofty mountains. It rolls up from her plains on the widening beams of a tropical sun's constant rays. It hurls its defiant shout in the midst of her raging tempests. It raises its sonorous voice in the deep roar of her sounding seas; and everywhere and at all hours its voiceless essence pervades all true hearts and cherishes all true souls.

Sir, the peans that stir the Cuban heart reach our shores. Shall they awaken no echo in the breasts of their more favored brethren? I hope the hour is not far distant when we may see the new Cuba, arisen from the reddened couch where she now in anguish lies covered with the wounds of shameless and wanton power, and clothed with the mantle of liberty, sit down at the feast of nations, where the jewel of her own sovereignty shall be among the brightest gems in the diadem of republics that crowns the western world.

Civil Rights.

SPEECH OF HON. A. WHITE,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4, 1875.

The House having under consideration the civil-rights bill—

Mr. WHITE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am keenly sensible that in the consideration of the bill and substitute now before the House we are dealing with an important and delicate subject, whose influences are to extend far beyond its prescribed sphere and are to continue for good or for evil for generations.

We are on the line where prejudices of race, of party, and of section collide, which must be remitted by us to harmony and repose, or their clashings will create disturbance, discord, and strife in one section of the Union, and in their ultimate consequences will make the nation itself tremble with their convulsions. The subject has already created much excitement and bitterness of feeling in this House and in the country.

There are extreme advocates of the civil-rights bill and extreme opponents to it—those who would give the remedies proposed to be conferred by it in the most offensive form and to be enforced by severe penalties, and those who would have no action by Congress, but leave such rights to the State courts, with the common-law remedy, which would be tantamount to no right and no remedy.

Between these extremes I have chosen the middle ground—"In medias res tutissimus ibis." My naturally ardent and zealous temperament has been tempered to moderation on this subject by contact with the people of both races upon whom mainly this bill is to operate, by lifelong familiarity with both the white and colored people of the South, by an anxious desire to maintain the rights and promote the interests of all, and a deep conviction of the dangers which mistaken legislation upon this subject will involve and the injuries it will inflict upon both races, but most heavily upon the colored, because the weaker of the parties to the strife which such legislation will engender. Extremes involve error, and error involves injury. From the order of the spheres to the motion of the atoms throughout the material universe this truth illustrates itself, and in the moral world, which in no small degree is a counterpart of the natural, this same rule obtains. No matter how obscured by zeal or passion or postponed by the prejudices of the hour, it vindicates itself by results; and when looked at in the clear light of the past it manifests itself as one of those truths which we are bound to discern at our peril and which can never be disregarded with impunity.

The bill which I offer as a substitute recognizes the rights of the colored people as distinctly as do either of the other bills before the House. Equal advantages in matters of common and public right is the common basis upon which they all rest. The difference is in the manner of enjoyment and in the remedies for enforcing those rights. The first thing to be considered in the making of a law, says the great commentator upon the laws of England, is the evil to be remedied.

The evil proposed to be remedied by this bill is that the people of color in many of the States are denied the privilege of admission into public schools, of traveling upon public conveyances, of obtaining food and lodging at public hotels when traveling, and of going to places of public amusement, theaters, &c.; and to secure to them equality of right in these respects is the object of this proposed legislation. The substance of the thing is the assertion of the right and its enforcement; when this shall be accomplished all will have been done which justice requires, and we cannot reasonably or safely desire or demand more. These are rights to enforce which an action at common law would lie, certainly as to most of them, and I think as to all, but these actions would have to be brought in the State courts, and I suppose there is no one bold enough to assert that in the Southern States such remedy would be effectual to enforce this class of rights.

Then we have two things to look to: the evil to be remedied, and the tribunals through which the laws for remedying the evil are to be enforced.

The substitute I offer affirms the rights in unequivocal terms, provides a remedy by suit in the United States courts, and gives a penalty of $500 as the measure of recovery, thus avoiding as far as is practicable the influence of prejudice or other unfavorable local surroundings in the prosecution of the right or obtaining compensation for its denial.

This brings us to the main difference between the bill offered by the committee, the Senate bill, and the substitute, which relates alone to the manner of enjoying these rights. The principle of the substitute is "equal rights and separate enjoyment." The Senate bill is equal rights and a community of enjoyment. That of the committee is "equal rights and separate enjoyment as to schools and a community of enjoyment as to the other rights in their bill."

This is a question of expediency, not a matter of right. Your committee concede this by providing in their bill for separate schools. Had it been a matter of right or of principle, they could not have provided in their bill for separate schools; but as it was neither, but only a question of expediency, they could do so, and acted wisely and well in so doing.

The irritations of an evil condition and excited prejudices aside, this question could be settled, I believe, satisfactorily to all by the adoption of the policy which human nature itself points out. The masses of the people, neither white nor colored, desire a mixing up of the two races in these matters of public right. White gathers to white and colored to colored not only in the South, but in the North and over the wide world. This is more emphatically true in the South from the fact that the colored race have been the slaves of the white, and consequently the line of social exclusion has been drawn more closely in both directions. It is not the wish of the colored people of the South to be forced to intermingling with the white people by laws ordained for that end. What they wish in this regard is their rights, and the enjoyment of them as they enjoy other rights of kindred character, with their own people, free and unconstrained by the presence of white people. This is so obvious to the impartial observer that it is difficult to enforce it by argument. It is in the nature of a self-evident proposition. The colored people cannot ignore their own race if they would, nor do they desire to do so.

There is a misconception in the northern mind upon this subject. The impression seems to be that the aversion to this mixing together is on the part of the whites of the South alone. This is not true. It exists, though less intense in degree, among the blacks as well as the whites. That it does exist among the whites is true, and to an extent formidable beyond any conception of it which I have heard expressed in any discussion of the subject public or private among our northern friends. The Anglo-Saxon does not mix socially or miscegenate upon terms of equality with any but the Germanic races, and not readily with any of them but his own. They have never mixed with any of the colored races. This predisposition or race prejudice, if you choose so to call it, has been somewhat modified in the Anglo-American by peculiar surroundings as to European peoples, but has been increased as to the darker races. The presence of the negro and the Indian in America, the one as a slave and the other as a savage, has penetrated the mind of the white race with deep aversion to mixing with colored people in social relations.

This is a fair statement of the case "in principiis," without reference to section or party. It is true of the whole people of the white races of the United States. There may be individual exceptions, where other influences may have warped the usual bent of the mind, but even with these many of them, if they would scrutinize their own actions in detail, would find, I apprehend, that in the privacy of intimate personal and home life this race prejudice unconsciously asserts its power. This prejudice is not only universal, but it is inveterate and difficult to eradicate. For while it is a prejudice it is also a sentiment. Pride of race and pride of country go hand in hand, and bear upon their broad bosom the loftiest trophies humanity can boast. It cannot be despised or lightly regarded by us either as men or as statesmen; but in both capacities we should fairly and justly consider it, with the view of dealing reasonably by it and wisely with the irritating subject upon which we are legislating.

In all legislation of this class, and in none more than the bill under consideration, we should be ever mindful of the past relations of the two races in the South, and of the habits of thought and feeling which in each respectively their past condition has produced and made part of their very being. Before emancipation command was the prerogative of the master, obedience the duty of the slave. The master had to provide for his slave in health and in sickness, in infancy and old age, and the slave had to work for his master and had to provide for nothing. From these relations came habits of exaction on the one hand, and of concession on the other. No black person scarce ever ventured resistance to a white man, whether his master or not. Subordination of the colored race to the white was the uniform condition. Self-reliance made stronger by habits of dominion was the leading characteristic of the white race, and humility was one of the most conspicuous traits of the other. Within the narrow sphere of his life the slave had but meager opportunities for self-development or growth of those faculties which constitute a higher manhood. In the physical he was a full, well-developed man; in the attributes of manhood outside of the limited sphere of his humble condition, a mere child. He is spoken of often as uneducated, untaught in the schools; that was not his greatest want; he was uneducated in life's experience. He had known none of the battles in the struggle for existence, for wealth, for position, which enter into the every-day life of a freeman, and make and mold and give strength to character.

Thus feebly endowed he was emancipated; his civil and political equality was ordained by law; he was invested with suffrage, and thus entered upon the political controversy with the large majority of the white people of the South, which was soon after inaugurated by the democratic party in its war upon the reconstruction measures of Congress as "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void."

The contest was an unequal one. All the advantages were on the side of their opponents, all the odds were against the colored people. But they had one trait which supplied deficiencies in themselves as political tacticians, and outweighed all the advantages of their adversaries, and that was their fidelity to the republican party. This carried them safely through that and a series of other political contests; but at the same time it stimulated the energies of and aroused their opponents to renewed and more extreme and desperate efforts to overpower them and the party which co-operated with and sustained them in the South.

The political war made by the democratic leaders at the South against the republican party, in reckless disregard of the decencies and proprieties which usually put limits to the acerbities of political contests, and in ruthless assaults upon private character, finds no parallel in the history of parties in this or any other country in modern times. The party is stigmatized as the negro party, as the "party of fools and thieves." Every white man who belongs to it is denounced as an apostate, as false to his race and his section, or as a miserable carpet-bag adventurer who has floated down South on the wave of reconstruction for purposes of plunder and personal aggrandizement. No matter what may have been his position, how long known or highly honored, upon his uniting himself with the republican party the white man at once becomes infamous, unworthy of association with honest and reputable people, and a fit object of hatred and scorn. The object of this from the beginning was plain, and it is plainer still in the light of subsequent events. It was to array the prejudices of the white people in the South against the republican party, and bring it into such disrepute as to prevent white men from joining it, and to constrain them to unite with the democratic party. These tactics, skillfully and vigorously followed by party leaders, continually plied by a venal partisan press, backed by the wealth of the community and the appliances which wealth can bring to bear upon political issues, pressing politics into every man's business and home, persecuting in the one and proscribing in the other, were severer tests than men are usually willing to subject themselves to for political convictions; and the result has been to a large extent to array the whites against the blacks, and to create that very antagonism of races which the southern democracy (to cover up their own purposes from the people) have been charging upon the republican party.

The war of the democratic party in the South (for there is no national democracy there) has been from the beginning upon negro suffrage. This was the bulwark against which their artillery was directed, and all other points or modes of attack were but incidental and accessorial to this main object. As long as the colored people held the ballot and the ballot was free, so long were they a power in the State and their voices would be heard in its administration and policy. This was a prerogative the southern democracy conceived to be exclusively their own. They do not believe a black man fit to be endowed with the franchise; and even after their pretended acquiescence, in the Greeley campaign of 1872, in the late amendments to the Constitution, when defeated, they returned with more envenomed hatred than ever before to their war upon negro suffrage, the negro, and the republican party. These continual assaults of almost the entire press of the South, quickened by political contests, so prejudiced and inflamed the minds of the large majority of the white people of the South and so emboldened men who had personal ends to accomplish in the political success of the democratic party, as to prepare the way for the bitter and desperate contest in 1874.

Before I enter upon this, that the spirit and purpose which actuate them may be better understood and appreciated, I desire to call the attention of the House to some other important facts which exerted large influence upon the last election. It has been the settled, deliberate policy of the democractic party of the South since 1868 to get control of all the State governments in the South. To this end every other consideration and interest was to yield. Until this was attained position or place in the Federal Government was not to be sought by the real leaders, and by many of them I believe was not desired; but when this consummation is reached, with fifteen States bound together in perpetual hostility to the party that suppressed the rebellion and in common regrets for a fallen confederacy, they realize that they will be, and they intend to be, a power in the land. They are not of the stuff, these southern leaders, which sues when it can demand, nor of the material which treads the "paths of dalliance" when the highway to power is open before them. They have long held back, but they have played their game well; and now, as State after State is captured by their political friends, and they think they see the successful issue of their grand design opening to their view, they begin to come to the front, and in the next Congress you will find between eighty and ninety unrepentant confederate officers, ranging from captains to generals, Representatives in this House. Such are to be the rulers of fifteen States united together by inseparable bonds of hostility to the policy that waged war to save the nation, that emancipated the slaves, that re-established the Union, and ordained the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. This combination, calling itself democratic, will unite with the democratic party North and will control that party; and when that party gets into power, as they say they believe they will in 1876, they will control the nation. A singular spectacle this would present to an intelligent world. A nation placed by its own people under the control of the very men who fifteen years before had rebelled against and attempted to destroy it!

Of this I hope to be able to speak more at length at another time. I now allude to it to illustrate the last canvass and to show how strong were the motives that pressed the southern democracy to the extreme and lawless means resorted to by them to secure success in the election. In illustrating these I will refer mainly to the canvass in Alabama, as I am more familiar with it, and the more readily because it is a fair exemplar of the canvass in the other cotton States. It may be well to remember that the rebellion of 1861 was concocted in the cotton States. In the border States it was known to a chosen few; but the people were not aware of and scarcely suspected it until the match was lighted which quickly flamed in war in eleven States.

The more extreme presses of the democratic party in Alabama for several years before 1874 had urged the race issue; but many others, while they plied every less hazardous means of arraying the white people against the colored, were opposed to an open and avowed issue of race against race until the civil-rights bill passed by the Senate at the last session so excited and alarmed the minds of the white people of the State and furnished to the quick discernment of their leaders such powerful and obvious means of drawing to the democratic party the almost solid white vote in the State, as to override all opposition to the race issue; and the democracy in State convention, in July, 1874, adopted and promulgated it in the first article of their platform, as follows:

First. That the radical and dominant faction of the republican party in this State persistently, by false and fraudulent representations, have inflamed the passions and prejudices of the negroes as a race against the white people, and have thereby made it necessary for the white people to unite and act together in self-defense and for the preservation of white civilization.

* * * * * * *

In connection with this I ask the reading of the third article of their platform.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. That the so-called civil-rights bill, recently passed the Federal Senate and now pending in the House, is a flagrant and dangerous invasion of the ancient conservative principles of personal liberty and free government, and is a palpable violation of the Federal Constitution, and presents an issue of vital moment to the American people, and calls upon them to decide at the ballot-box whether they will or will not be coerced to the absolute social as well as political equality of the negro race with themselves. We view with abhorrence the attempt on the part of the Federal Government to take control of schools, colleges, churches, hotels, railroads, steamboats, theaters, and grave-yards, for the purpose of establishing negro equality and enforcing it under numerous penalties of fines, damages, and imprisonment.

Mr. WHITE. The republican party convened about a month later. It protested against the race issues, and took the position with regard to civil rights which I have embodied in the substitute I now offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. The republican party of Alabama, in State convention assembled, again declares its unshaken confidence in and its unalterable devotion to the great principles of human liberty which called it into existence, namely, the civil and political equality of all men, without distinction of race or color.

2. In the practical application of these principles we have neither claimed nor desired the social equality of different races or of individuals of the same race; neither do we claim or desire it now; and all assertions to the contrary are without the slightest foundation in fact. We reject the issue of race against race, which is tendered us by the democratic party, as fraught with incalculable evils to our whole people, which sows the seeds of ruin to all our material, social, and political interests, and which will, if persisted in by that party, speedily plunge us again into a war with the Government of the United States.

3. We have not made a race issue in the past, neither do we now make or tender such an issue. What we demand for one man we demand for all men, without distinction of race or color, and we point with pride and confidence to every line of our political record in proof of this declaration; and we denounce the assertion that we have "made it necessary for the white people to unite and act together in self-defense and for the preservation of white civilization" as untrue, and an emanation from that selfish spirit which in the past demanded everything for one race and was unwilling to concede anything to the other.

4. That the race issue now tendered by the democracy of Alabama is but the outcropping and is the natural sequence of the ambitious spirit which led a peaceful people into war with their Government in 1861; which during the war rode roughshod over the people of the South, and after the war perpetuated its carnival of blood by a career of crime in the Ku-Klux Klans which, in the extent of its organization, the numbers involved in it, the multiplicity and heinousness of its crimes, and the manner of their commission, find no parallel on the rolls of human infamy. It is now as it was then, each in its different mode, resistance to the Constitution and laws of the land; and as in those failure and swift retribution followed, so in this they will come with vengeance sharpened and envenomed by continued and repeated persistence in wrong.

5. That we neither desire nor seek the invasion of the rights of the white people by the colored; we only ask equal advantages in matters of public and common right; and in order that we may be understood and no false charges made against us, we hereby declare that the republican party does not desire or seek mixed schools or mixed accommodations for the colored people with the white people; but they ask that in all of these the advantages shall be equal. We want no social equality enforced by law; we recognize the fact that every home is sacred from intrusion, and that in a free country every one can dictate for himself the line of social exclusion; that society governs itself by laws more inexorable than statute or common law, and opens or closes its doors to whomsoever it will, and that no civil law can or should invade it.

Mr. WHITE. These were the issues presented to the people of Alabama in the last election. The battle, which before that time had been made upon negro suffrage, was concentrated against the negro, and the issue was proclaimed to be a war of races, which left only the alternative of success or extermination.

The view which the democracy took of the situation, as well as the manner and tone of the canvass, can be best appreciated by a few extracts from leading democratic journals, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"There is no half-way ground; we must meet the issue fairly and squarely, and we must go either with the white man's party or the negro man's party."

The Birmingham News copied the above, and commented as follows:

"This is emphatically our platform, and we have always stood firmly on it. * * * The republican party assumes as a fundamental truth that the negro is capable of civilization, and that his ignorance and brutality were caused by the tyranny and misrule of the dominant race. We believe every word of this to be false. * * * Emancipation threw the whites and blacks on their own resources, and each race must depend upon its own inherent strength. Freeing the slaves was a declaration of war between the Caucasian and African—a war that is going on now and that will go on silently, ruthlessly, and unceasingly until one or the other is exterminated. * * * Let us recognize facts, admit that a war of races is progressing, and then every man will range himself under the banner of his kindred. For ourselves we say, no compromise, no 'unification,' but a white man's rule, a white man's civilization, and a white man's government, or ruin and extermination!"—Eutaw Whig.

The rights guaranteed by the State and Federal Constitutions do not frighten us in the least. We do not expect to repeal any of the recent enactments. They may stand forever, but we intend, by superior intelligence, stronger muscle, and greater energy to make them dead letters on the statute-book. We intend to beat the negro in the strife, the warfare, the unending battle for life, and defeat means but one thing—extermination!—Birmingham News.

Having exhausted every other milder means of self-defense, having employed persuasive words and flung harmless grass, the white man finds it necessary now to aim some more substantial missiles that will prove his earnestness in the determination to make the rude negro hasten down to the level where he belongs, and cease gobbling up the fruits of a civilization which he neither helps to strengthen nor advance. Of such effective missiles, whenever he shall choose to use them, the white man has his full supply, and plenty of hands there be to throw them. * * *

Whether the sudden, violent dissolution of the quiet relation for that two hundred years had subsisted between the two races in the South shall turn out to have been a declaration of war between the Caucasian and Ethiopian depends, in our judgment, entirely upon whether the indolent, thick-skulled, and unaspiring woolyheads, after the too generous and conceding white man shall manifest his resolution to retreat no further, will dare advance against his rights—rights which belong to his superior race; rights which God bestowed; which, through the uncontradicted antecedents of all time, his long lineage has maintained, and which at this late day he will not be ready to surrender till he has ridden up to his bridle bits in blood. We do not believe, however, that any such bloody necessity will come. The unambitious and natural harmless negro will never force it of himself. At the instigation of the wicked backers who beguile him, he may tempt the destruction which such a conflict would make sure. * * * * *

It will be given in no ambiguous words and with an emphasis and unanimity which will astonish those who have so ignorantly misconceived or so insolently presumed upon the generous deportment which the superior has heretofore exhibited to the inferior—those who have so thoroughly misconstrued the condescension with which intelligence has expostulated with incapacity, and the patience with which a manly but misplaced confidence has parleyed with unreasonable and intolerable demands, which for good and peaceful purposes it endeavored to enlighten and to pacify, but to which it never for one moment intended to capitulate.—Eufaula Times.

Disguise the fact under as many specious pleas and sophisms as you may, it is none the less apparent that the great struggle in the South is the race struggle of white against black, for political supremacy. Those who assert and contend for the supremacy of the white race are arrayed under the banner of the democratic and conservative party; and it matters not how pure the intention of the radical voter may be, every white man in the South feels and knows that, to the full extent of his vote and influence, he is aiding and assisting the black man to become the ruler and master of the white! * * * The struggle going on among us is not a mere contest for the triumph of this or that platform of party principles; it is a contest between antagonistic races and for that which is held dearer than life by the white race. If the negro must rule Alabama permanently, (whether in person or by proxy,) the white man must ultimately leave the State. He is more than blind who cannot see that far into the future. On the other hand, if the white man must rule, then will the deluded negro go.—Montgomery Advertiser.

"The race issue means a democratic war in Alabama" is the title of a good deal of political stuff that the Montgomery Journal (radical) publishes. It states exactly what we believe—that it does mean a war, not only democratic, but a war between white and black.—Mobile Register.

Mr. WHITE. By such extreme and inflammatory articles as these the minds of the white people of Alabama were roused to a degree never before equaled in the many fierce political contests through which they have passed. They were told that the issue was one of race against race; that the negro or the white man must rule Alabama; that the object of the civil-rights bill was to enforce social equality with the negro by penalties, fines, and imprisonment; that while the rich, able to maintain private schools, would be exempt from its operation, the poor would be compelled to send their children to school with negro children or be deprived of the benefit of the public schools. These and like appeals stirred the white people in Alabama and other Southern States to a degree of heat that absorbed all other feeling, dissolved past party allegiance and political convictions, and massed nearly the entire white population of the South against the republican party, while in the North the measure created no counter excitement, aroused no enthusiasm, awakened no sympathy, gave you no additional strength.

But it is to the effects of this measure upon the people in the Southern States I wish to call attention. The elections there have swept nearly every republican Representative from the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, and Arkansas. From these seven States there are only * * * * * Representatives to guard the interests and assert the rights of southern republicans, white or colored, in the national Congress, while in the State Legislatures there has been a corresponding diminution of power. Falling bodies move with accelerated rapidity and cumulative force, and unless this downward movement is speedily checked, in a brief time the republicans in the South will have no Representative here, and no power or influence in a Legislative Assembly in the South. Next year Mississippi will follow Alabama, and at her next election South Carolina will wheel into line; and then the consummation to which I have before alluded, so devoutly looked for by the southern democratic leaders, will be attained, and then, too, the deep travail of the nation will begin.

These consequences have followed from the proposal to pass the civil-rights bill of last session, and will be multiplied, and it may be made irreparable by its passage. The result then will be to lose you the entire South, and to break and dissipate your political power there for all time to come. Looking at it as a mere question of party tactics, where in the North and West can you expect to gain, by the passage of this bill, States or voters to compensate you for the loss of nine hundred thousand voters and seven or eight States in the South?

The extracts which have been read were the announcements which heralded the inauguration of the late election canvass in Alabama by the democracy; a war of the white man against the black man; a war of races and a war "declared by the freeing the slaves; between the Caucasian and African. A war that is going on now, and that will go on silently, ruthlessly, and unceasingly until one or the other is exterminated."

Republicans were not regarded as political opponents but as enemies, whose suppression was necessary to the preservation of the white people of the State. The main struggle in Alabama was for a majority in the lower house of the General Assembly. The democracy already had the senate by a small majority, but the last house of representatives was republican by a majority of some five or six, and it was known that in the new house, elected this last fall, the contest would be close, and reasonably the majority could not be large either way. The importance of this contest consisted in this, that if the republicans carried the house it would enable them to check any hostile legislation which the democratic senate might originate, and if the democrats carried it, they would have entire control of the legislative power of the State.

With this end in view and also for the purpose of striking terror in the minds of the large colored population in Middle Alabama, the democracy selected three large counties—Sumter in the west and bordering on Mississippi, Barbour on the east and bordering on Georgia, and Mobile in the extreme south—as localities where desperate efforts to carry the democratic ticket were to be made. These three counties aggregated eleven representatives, and if carried for the democracy would insure a majority in the house and thus secure the control of the Legislature. In Sumter and Barbour Counties there were large majorities of colored republicans, but a very small number of white republicans in either. There was a white republican in Sumter County named Walter P. Billings and a colored mail-agent named Ivy who took an active interest in organizing the republicans in the county, holding meetings, addressing the colored people at their public assemblies, and assisting in organizing and preparing them for the approaching elections. Billings was a lawyer by profession, and had the reputation of a gentleman of fair intelligence and capacity and of good character. About the 1st of August, on his return from a public meeting of republicans where he had addressed the people, he was shot riding along the public highway by men in ambush and he and his horse both killed by different shots about five o'clock in the afternoon and within half a mile of his home, the reports of the guns being heard by his family. The next day, search being made for him on account of his not having come home, his body and that of his horse were found in the direction of the reports of the guns of the evening before, neither being disturbed or having anything taken from it. No cause for this assassination or explanation of it other than that he was the leader of the republican party in the county and an earnest and efficient worker in the cause has been within my knowledge ever put forth.

Not long after this Ivy, the mail-agent, who was an intelligent colored man and an ardent republican, earnest and active in organizing the party in the county, was killed in his mail-car on the train of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad in Sumter County. The train was flagged down and stopped by a false signal, and a number of armed men near the track walked up to the mail-car and shot Ivy, riddling him with buck-shot and killing him instantly. The killing of two of their leaders, the riding of armed men through the county threatening and insulting the colored people, together with other attempted acts of violence, produced consternation and terror among them, an account of which I will have read in extracts from a report made to Hon. J. W. Douglass, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by a government detective, who was sent there to endeavor to discover the murderers of Ivy.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIVINGSTON, SUMTER COUNTY, ALABAMA,
October 13, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to report that on September 13, accompanied by Mr. J. G. Hester, special agent of the Post-Office Department, I left Selma for this county. We were both disguised as peddlers of tobacco and whisky, and traveled with a wagon. On the night of the 17th we camped within one mile of Weaver's store, in Perry County, and about dark a man named Hinton rode into camp, gave and answered the old Ku-Klux signs and grips, and said, "We are 'straightening out the niggers,' and when we have killed out the leaders we intend to carry the election. We are to have a meeting to-night at Weaver's store;" and as the whisky gurgled down his throat the oaths rippled from his mouth with frightful rapidity. With many imprecations on the Government, anathemas for Yankees, and curses for "radical niggers," he rode away, a true type of a southern gentleman. It was a bright moonlight night, and for several hours we could see them, to the number of from sixty to seventy, riding toward Weaver's store, and just before daylight we saw them returning to their homes.

On the night of the 18th we camped at Van Dorn station, and there saw the first signs of that terrorism which we have every day since witnessed. If we approached a negro cabin for water, or to inquire as to the road, its inmates would flee at our approach, deserting their humble cabins and leaving its scanty furniture for us to destroy or let alone. On the 18th we passed through Demopolis, crossed the Tombigbee River, and camped for dinner on the plantation of Major Botton, and we were honored with the major's presence. He said: "We are killing out the leaders of the radical party; have killed two, Billings and Ivy, and are now after the third, and we expect to kill him to-day, as we have got him in the swamp at Belmont."

We left this politician, and in the afternoon arrived at Belmont, where we found about two hundred armed men, who said they were in pursuit of Bob Ried, a radical leader, and that they intended to kill him on sight. Ried is a colored member of the Legislature. Some of these men told us they were the sheriff's posse, and others said they were volunteers, and all said they were there to kill Bob Ried. We asked what offense he had committed, and the only reply was, that he was a leader, and they must put him out of the way. The sheriff has since told us that there was no charge against him, and no warrant issued for his arrest. In a rail pen were six shivering negro prisoners, guarded by a number of this "posse," whose special business seemed to be to frighten the prisoners by pointing their guns at them and threatening to shoot them. Squads of them would ride through the swamp, and return with no tidings of Ried, and others would take their places, and return with the same result. A suspicion crept into our minds that possibly they were afraid they might find him.

We drove out of Belmont, looking for a camping-place, and found armed men scattered along the road, and also met the colored mail-rider, who, with the mail, had been driven back by them and not allowed to deliver his mail in Livingston. We camped that night on Farris's plantation, and all night long could hear these men riding up and down the road. On Sunday, the 20th, we remained camped all day, and our camp was frequented by these men, who toward night informed us that they were disbanded and ordered home, but were instructed to hold themselves in readiness for another call. On the 21st we stopped at the house of a Mr. Hawkins, on the Belmont road, five miles from Livingston. He said: "We have been riding at night for three months, and have now got the niggers regulated. We have put several out of the way, but we want to git Bob Reid." We left him and camped that night in Livingston. Here we obtained the first clue to the Ivy murderers, and on the night of the 24th we camped at the house of one of them, Alonzo Kornegay. He spent a part of the night with us, and from him we obtained more information. In the morning we left this cheerful murderer, and continued perfecting our evidence until the 27th, when I left for Mobile to obtain warwants for their arrest. Before leaving we made arrangements with Captain Mills, the post commander, to delay the operations of two deputy marshals, whom we learned were on the way to this place, until I could return from Mobile, and then make our arrests at the same time. They, however, proceeded with theirs, and our murderers are in the swamps, skulking like wild beasts, and we are continually hunting them, with no good prospect of their capture. About two hundred of their Ku-Klux friends are also in the swamps.

Order once more reigns in Sumter, but much suffering is resulting from this disorder and lawlessness, and much more is to follow this winter among the humble class of citizens who have been tilling the soil. They have been driven from the fields and their crops are destroyed. They are denied the right of free speech and life is made unendurable by continued persecution until many have expressed a wish to return to slavery. We are amazed at their forbearance. Any other race would long ere this have risen and made this country desolate, but there has been no unlawful assemblage, no armed bands, as has been represented, and all they ask is the right to gather their crops in peace.

Mr. WHITE. Captain Mills, of the United States Army, was sent and stationed with a small command of troops at Livingston, the county seat of Sumter County.

These troops, and the arrest through their assistance by the United States marshal of persons charged with the assassination of Billings and Ivy, and of others charged with various violations of the enforcement act, put an effectual check upon these outrages for the time being in Sumter, reinspirited the colored republicans, and the result was a quiet and orderly election and the usual large republican majority in the county.

In Barbour County the demonstration of violence by the democracy began in a city election in Eufaula in February last. At that time, in a riot gotten up near the polls, an armed body of whites fired upon the colored republicans, shot one of them two or three times, and drove others from the polls, and thus carried the election.

During the canvass of last fall there were frequent disturbances of republicans in their political meetings in the county, and on the day of election the rôle of February was re-enacted on a more violent and fatal scale. An account of this I read from a private letter by a gentleman well acquainted with the facts, and whose sources of information and statements can be relied on:

At Eufaula, on the day of election, good and truthful witnesses will testify that eight hundred to one thousand voters were forcibly driven from the polls and from voting by an armed mob of white-leaguers. Besides this, eight or ten republicans were killed on the ground, several have since died from wounds received, and one to two hundred more were more or less wounded. This mob commenced shooting without the shadow even of excuse, and certainly by previous understanding and agreement, as they had the guns with which they did the shooting stored or placed ready up-stairs in the houses on both sides of the streets near the polling places. When the shooting was to commence, the White League leaders called out, "Company A!" "Company B!" "Rally!" "White men to the sidewalks!" These orders were at once obeyed, and then the firing commenced on the colored men in the streets, with the results above stated.

What transpired at Spring Hill, another voting precinct in Barbour County, will appear from the following published letter from Judge Keils, who was the United States supervisor at that precinct, and was engaged in the discharge of his duties as supervisor, and from an extract from the Eufaula Times, a democratic paper:

EUFAULA, ALABAMA, November 6, 1874.

EDITOR JOURNAL:

I telegraphed you last night that my son Willie was dead. This you must know is almost overwhelming me—I am in poor condition to write. Just at dark, before the counting of votes had commenced at Spring Hill, the crowd rushed into the room, and commenced firing at me. When they entered, I stepped to the end of the counter (the election was held in an old store) pulling Willie behind me to prevent him being shot. Several shots were fired at me, when the lamp was smashed. All was dark then, and Willie and myself stepped behind the counter and sat down under it. A vigorous firing then commenced at the end of the counter, which I thought at the instant were entering the counter and doing no damage. It was at this time Willie was shot, one ball entering the bowels, and the other three entering the right thigh. Willie did not flinch or complain, though his hand was on my shoulder while he was being murdered, so that I knew nothing of it till after those (or the one) who murdered him had moved off. If I had known he was being shot, I could easily have killed the fellow; but as soon as he moved off Willie said to me, "Pa, let us try to get out, I am shot to pieces." This was the first intimation I had that he was shot. Then I told him to be quiet a little longer. But just then several gentlemen rushed to me and assured me they would protect me, and they did. Then I missed Willie's hand from my shoulder, felt for him in the dark, but could not find him. As he (Willie) told me afterward, some demon seized him by the leg, dragged him on the floor, and kicked him. There was such firing and yells that I heard nothing of this brutal dragging and kicking at that time. The mob was yelling "Kill him," "Shoot him," "D—n him," "Kill him," &c. One or two of those who saved me (they were of the better class of democrats) went to see after Willie, found him, and carried him away, with the assistance of some colored men. I found him at Doctor Davie's near by, to which place I was guarded a few minutes after. He, myself, and wife and daughter, who went to Spring Hill at once, as soon as they could get there, were all treated well at Doctor Davie's, and by the neighbors.

This was a put-up job to destroy the ballot-box, in which there was four hundred and fifty or five hundred republican majority, and murder me. And their treatment in dragging and kicking Willie, and telling him as they did, "God damn you, get out of here," shows that they were quite as willing to kill him as me, because they knew it was not me they were kicking and dragging, although it was dark in the room.

Willie was in his seventeenth year, and a better, high-toned, more honorable boy never lived, I am sure. He did no one any harm. He said to me often during the canvass that he knew I was in danger, and wanted to go with me to republican meetings, and he went with me to most of them. Then he wanted to go with me to Spring Hill to the election, as he did. When some firing was done out in the crowd and he thought I was in danger inside the room, he said he wanted to come in, the managers consented, and this is why he was in there.

I feel that I can never get over his death.

Yours, truly,

E. M. KEILS.

The accidental shooting of Master Willie Keils, a lad of fourteen years and son of E. M. Keils, judge of the Eufaula city court, is the subject of regret among all classes of the people, and he and his family have the sincere sympathy of all who have spoken to us about it, both male and female. We would not in this connection allude to the circumstances under which the little boy was shot; but would say what all must know that the shot that struck him was intended for the father, and that no one desired to harm little Willie.—Eufaula Times.

This democratic editor proposes to extenuate one murder by the avowal of an intent to commit another, without a word of reprobation or condemnation of the act or of those who committed it. But even the proposed extenuation is falsified by the facts as stated by Judge Kiels, which show that the murderers intended to kill both of them, and the sympathy is mockery which accompanies its expression of regret for the killing of the son by declaring that the intention was to murder the husband. The result was, however, that notwithstanding the driving off of the republican voters at Eufaula, and the loss from the destruction of the Sping Hill box, still the majority of votes cast in the county was for the republican candidates, and they obtained certificates of election, and when the General Assembly met they were enrolled and took their seats as members, but on assembling and organizing a resolution was introduced in the house of representatives, and a few days afterward was passed by the democratic majority, ousting the republican members who were elected, and seating the democratic candidates who were defeated, as the members for the county of Barbour. There was no contest allowed as provided by law, no proofs taken, no discussion permitted; and this finale, dripping with blood and foul with outrage and infamy, is thus exulted over by a democratic editor in Alabama. The point (intended) to the boast is, that it is notorious that Barbour County has a large republican majority:

Barbour County can be safely put down as the banner county. She has been gloriously redeemed by the efforts of the noble men on our county ticket. All honor and praise to them for their earnest efforts.—Clayton Courier.

In Mobile, the other county of which I have spoken, the democracy manifested the same violent purpose to carry the election, no matter how flagrant the wrongs or reckless the means by which it was effected. What occurred and was done there on the day of the election I will give from an eye-witness, as it corresponds with what I have learned from other sources:

MOBILE, ALABAMA, November 4, 1874.

EDITOR JOURNAL: I think that I told you the truth when in my last to you I said that the democrats intended to carry the whole county and city election at the point of the bayonet. It has been done. Republican voters were intimidated and driven from the polls before they had deposited their ballot. It was a preconcerted plan of the democracy here to use all manner and kinds of intimidation in order that they would be successful. They had an organized army of white-leaguers, consisting of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, that paraded the street from poll to poll about two o'clock in the afternoon. Some two or three hundred colored republican voters left the seventh ward in order to vote at the fourth ward. Couriers of the army of democratic white-leaguers were dispatched to every poll to inform the white-leaguers that a lot of colored men had left the seventh ward with the intention of voting at the fourth ward. Immediately upon the reception of these courier dispatches a regular line of battle was formed. As soon as the republican voters crossed from Saint Emanuel street to Government street a volley of pistol-shots greeted them. Then the colored voters retreated, leaving one dead colored man on the street, and carrying off four wounded. From that time till the closing of the polls not a colored man could be seen at or near the poll. On last night an organized mob visited the house of Allen Alexander, Rev. George W. Bryant, and R. R. Mimms, with the intention of killing these colored men for the conspicuous part they had taken for the republicans during the day. Alexander had gone to jail in order to save his life. Bryant and Mimms slept out all during the day, and there were threats to kill Alexander and others. The seventh ward ballot-boxes had to be escorted to the office of the judge of probate by a detachment of soldiers, as it was known that in those boxes there was a majority of some five hundred in favor of the republicans. From the appearance of our streets on yesterday was brought back to memory the days of the lost confederacy. The United States special deputy marshals were abused, and all manner of insulting things said to them, the General Government denounced, saying that if the United States will only keep her hands off we will fix you Union men. If the General Government for one moment believes that these people of Alabama are loyal to its cause, they are badly mistaken. We are on the eve of another war.

Yours, ALABAMIAN BY BIRTH.

The result of the election was eighteen hundred democratic majority in a county which heretofore has about as often gone republican as democratic, and in which our republican friends, who were active and vigilant and were well posted, felt the utmost confidence that they would be the victors.

In the statements I have made with regard to specific outrages I have referred to no equivocal or doubtful facts. As to the details there might be some dispute; but as to the main facts, they are notorious in Alabama, and I do not believe that any one will dare a denial of them.

There are many others which I might enumerate, but I must pass to other topics which illustrate the animus of the southern democracy toward republicans, and develop the means resorted to by them to carry the southern elections.

The southern democracy regard the Constitution and the laws conferring citizenship and civil and political equality upon the negro as a fraud upon the white people of the South, and they intend to make them dead letters upon the statute-book. Upon this subject some of their presses are outspoken, and the conduct of the party is far more emphatic than language could be. I have given some extracts upon this point. I will give others.

The Clerk read as follows:

We must act speedily and decidedly, no matter what it costs. Better lose the lives of half our citizens than see the whole outrageously trampled upon by an ignorant and savage negro mob. We suggest to our brethren the formation of White Leagues in every civil district, in every county in the State. Let them meet in secret and be bound by the most solemn oaths, and let death be the penalty of any violations of the order. Already, we have good reason to believe, such leagues have been formed in many counties, and the thing is becoming more and more popular every day of its existence. This land is ours, by right and by inheritance, and we must, we will control it, even at the expense of oceans of blood and millions of lives. The constant cry all over the South is, the negroes are threatening to burn this town and that; to murder the women and children in this place or the other. Let the hellish, barbarian brutes go on; we will take a score of lives for every woman or child murdered, and when once we start, in fact, not a damnable negro savage will be left in the South. We accept the gage.—Tishamingo Herald.

The proper name for the inferior race is negro, and no offense need be taken thereat by negroes. As for the right of suffrage, we believe the day is not far distant when that wrong is withheld from the race. They are incapable of voting intelligently, of sitting on juries with judgment, and of witnessing against white people with truth and fairness. Therefore we hail with delight the good time coming when they (the negroes) will be put back in their normal condition—not of slavery, but simply of inferior freedom. The "fields" are the proper place for them.—Tuskaloosa (Alabama) Blade.

The Logan County (Ohio) Sentinel thus announces its programme:

We will use the power to smash the Congo dynasty; clean up the statute-books by rending away the whole chapter of black republican legislation, to place the sovereignty of the country once more in the hands of the only race able and fit to use it wisely and well; reinstate the white man in his place of power and supremacy; and remand the negro to his proper position of subordination. We will have a national convention of all the States to revise and amend the Constitution of the United States, and there will be no niggers in that convention. The Constitution as revised will be the Constitution as it was in 1866.

Mr. WHITE. Do not these last two sound very like the war-whoop of the secessionist of 1860 in the South answered back by his confederate copperhead ally in the North? These are some of the signal-guns of an oppressed people referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi at the last session. A proclaimed defiance of the Constitution and laws, and an avowed purpose to put them aside and to deprive the colored people of the right to vote, of the right to sit on juries, and the right to testify as witnesses in courts, and to remit them to their normal condition, as they term it, in the fields.

The oppressions of tax-payers, property-owners, &c., in the South, about which we hear so much, and upon which the democratic party of the South base their appeals to the nation, and under cover of which they press their immediate purpose of annihilating the republican party South, and their ultimate aim a southern confederacy, is traceable to their opposition to negro suffrage and the other civil rights which are conferred by the Constitution and laws upon the colored people, and to a deep-seated and unalterable purpose to subvert them, no matter what may be the peril or the cost of so doing.

Had the white people of the South cordially recognized these rights of the colored people when they were granted by law, and conferred with and advised them as to the manner of exercise of these rights; had they co-operated with them and professed a willingness and a desire to unite with them to promote the general welfare and build up and renew a common country, the colored people would have most gladly united with them; would have been counseled by them; would have put them into positions; and together, the whites taking the lead, the natives of the South, white and colored, would have ruled their own section, and the reign of the carpet-bagger, that political rawhead and bloody-bones and scape-goat, would have never been heard of in the South. The correctness of this opinion was demonstrated by the conduct of the colored people toward their white people, as they called them "our white people," for years after the war. In everything except politics they advised with their former owners and white friends. If they wanted anything, they came to them for it. If they got into trouble or difficulty, to the white people they applied for relief, and it was very generally extended to them.

It has been a common remark in the South among the white people that these darkies (say they) come to us about everything else, are advised by us and follow our advice, but in politics we can exercise no influence over them. The reason was obvious enough, but was one they did not wish to see, and therefore they did not see it; for it was the corner-stone of their party policy, "opposition to negro suffrage." This was the impassable barrier between the democratic party of the South and the colored people. These latter, ignorant as they were, knew that suffrage was the only anchorage of safety to them; that without it all other rights would be mere figments; freedom itself a mockery; and that deprived of it their place would be (as the Alabama editor from whom I have just quoted declares) in the field, and that they would be of no more consideration than the mules by their side. When in 1868 Mr. Blair wrote his celebrated letter declaring the reconstruction measures of Congress "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void," he sounded the key-note of southern democratic policy, the central idea of their party aims, and the governing principle of all their movements, the fruitful source of our political troubles in the South since the war, and destined in the coming years to swell into the trumpet-call to another rebellion more formidable both in its moral antagonisms and its physical proportions than that from which the nation has been recently delivered. War upon negro sufferage; war upon the Constitution and laws which confer political rights upon the colored people—these have been the battle-cry which has heated and inflamed the southern mind up to the point of a war of races, and now it is war upon the negro, openly declared, defiantly and bitterly prosecuted, upon the avowal by the democrats themselves that it is a war of extermination.

A policy so deadly in purpose, so hazardous in execution, and malignant in spirit involves in its execution extreme and relentless persecution of the negro and of all republicans in the South. Proscription, calumny, persecution in business, ostracism in society, in church; these are openly advocated in their presses, resolved in their public meetings, and practiced among the people. The Tuscaloosa Blade, in an article styled "After the battle of the ballot-box," says:

We have met the enemy and they are ours. The State of Alabama is redeemed, perhaps forever. We say perhaps, because it rests with the white people of the State to determine this vital point. The fruits of this victory, so far from being felt for two years only, will be enjoyed for ages if we do our duty. We must quit fostering the ungrateful viper—the radical, white and black—in our bosom, thereby warming into life the graceless reptile to turn upon us and smite us. Better that every acre of land in Alabama should be uncultivated than that the State should ever again fall into the ruthless hands of the fools, thieves, and knaves who have well-nigh ruined the material interests of the Commonwealth and reveled in despotic power over their superiors in everything that constitutes true manhood. One of two things regarding the negro; either he must be made to keep away from the polls, or, if he must go through the farce of voting, he must be made, by the controlling influence of capital, to vote with his employers. We must labor to this end unceasingly and at all temporary sacrifices pecuniarily. The political salvation of the State is above all other considerations. As for those so-called white men who acted in concert with the negro masses, white democrats must avoid such political lepers as they would shun physical lepers. Total ostracism is the word.

There should be kept and carefully preserved for future reference a black list, or book of remembrance, in every parish, wherein should be inscribed the names of those white men who in this emergency prove recreant to the instincts and duties of race and cast their lot with the African. The infamous record should be as conspicuous for all time to come as the pictures of the notorious criminals in the rogues' galleries of large cities. These men must not be forgotten. Let their names be written in the black list with a pen of adamant, that they and all who descend from their loins to the fourth generation may be pariahs forever, cast out from all association with the Caucasian race. Let all who adhere to the negro party in this political contest be reckoned negroes, and treated as such. Let the black list for Saint Mary be opened. Let the names of those who pant for immortal infamy be enrolled. Whose name shall head the list? We know two, father and son, who have equal claims to the distinction.

These among many will suffice to show the political bulls of excommunication which are issued and enforced as far as is possible by imbittered public opinion against white republicans in the South merely for being republicans. Neither food or water, fire or shelter, word of greeting or look of salutation, is to be given to them; but they are shunned and abandoned, forsaken and despised, spurned and cast out, as moral reprobates and political outlaws, because they have the conscience and the courage in an unfriendly community to stand for justice and right, for the Constitution and laws of their country.

These white republicans are known by the contemptuous appellation of carpet-bagger and scalawag, names conferred upon them by the chivalry, in whose political interest prowl the bands of Ku-Klux and White League assassins in the South, and as such, especially the carpet-bagger, they have become a by-word and reproach. We of the South are not responsible for them; they are a northern growth, and unless going South expatriates them, they are still northern men, even as you are—bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh. But who are they? I can speak for my State, for I think I know nearly all in the State, and there are a good many of them. Most of them have titles, not empty titles complaisantly bestowed in piping times of peace, but titles worthily won by faithful and efficient service in the Federal armies, or plucked with strong right arm from war's rugged front upon the field of battle. Many of them bear upon their bodies scars of wounds received while fighting under your flag for the nation's life and the country's glory. These men either went South with the Union armies and at the close of the war remained there, or went there soon after, in the latter part of 1865 or early in 1866, to make cotton. The high price of cotton in 1865 and 1866, and the facility with which cheap labor could be obtained, induced many enterprising northern men, especially the officers in the Federal armies in the South who had seen and become familiar with the country, to go or remain there to make cotton. Many purchased large plantations and paid large sums of money for them; others rented plantations, in some instances two or three, and embarked with characteristic energy in planting. This, it should be remembered, was before the civil-rights bill or the reconstruction acts, before the colored people had any part in political matters, and two years before they ever proposed to vote or claimed to have the right to vote at any election in the Southern States.

When the political contests of 1868 came on in which the colored people first took a part in politics, as near all the native population in the large cotton-growing sections were opposed to negro suffrage and opposed to the republican party, they very naturally turned to these northern men for counsel and assistance in the performance of the new duties and exercise of their newly acquired political rights, and they as natually gave them such counsel and became their leaders, and were intrusted with official power by them.

This brief summary will give you a correct idea of the manner in which, as I believe, nine-tenths of those who are called carpet-baggers became involved in political affairs South, and dispose of a very large part of the slanders which have been promulgated against them not only by their political enemies at the South, but by the treacherous northern knaves who, under the pretense of being republicans and as correspondents of so-called republican papers at the North, have gone down South prepared in advance to stab the cause of justice and of truth, of humanity and freedom, of the law and the Constitution, to the heart. Could these miserable miscreants have known with what ineffable contempt they were regarded by the very men whose credulous dupes they were, with what scathing scorn they regarded northern men who would lend themselves to traduce whole classes of northern men, who would allow themselves to be used as the tools to break down the political party to which they professed to belong, it would have diminished much the self-complacency with which their work was done. They could have realized that southern men, though bold and often reckless of the means by which they seek to attain political ends, that earnest and vehement, ardent and high-spirited, under the influence of one great ultimate aim to which all else is subordinated, they may reach politically to the parallel of the dogma which once prevailed in the religious world, "there is no faith to be kept with heretics," yet they can never be brought to descend to sympathy with or respect for such low-browed infamy as theirs.

These two classes, the carpet-baggers and scalawag, are the object of peculiar assault by the democracy, for they know that these constitute the bulwark of the republican party in the South. Without their co-operation and assistance the colored republicans could neither organize nor operate successfully in political contests, and without them the party would soon be extinguished in the Southern States.

These are the classes, especially the native republican element, upon which the civil-rights bill is brought to bear with greatest effect, and how great the effect is demonstrated by the recent elections in the South.

The native white republican element is composed of such of the white population as, accepting the results of the war in good faith as a final settlement of the political issues involved in it and with the adjustments that grow out of it, united themselves with the republican party and advocated its policy after the war, and of the Union men of the South.

The men who sustained your cause during the war, who separated themselves from friend and brother, from life-long associations, from State, and the land of their birth, to stand by the Federal Government; the men who rallied to your bugle-call in East Tennessee and kept the banner of the Union defiantly floating when it had gone down in every other portion of the State; the men in Alabama, who, far away from you and your armies, surrounded by enemies and environed with perils, still remained stedfast and true in their mountain fastnesses to the Union, no shouts of applauding multitudes, no gathering of mighty armies, no waving banners, no drum or trumpet nor aught of war's proud pageantry was there. No nation's sympathy, no beating of the great national heart swelling like the waves on ocean shores suffused them with its inspiration, or nerved them with its electric power; but in the solitudes of their forests, in remote fastnesses, prosecuted as traitors, condemned as felons, hunted with dogs like wild beasts, these men, true to God and their country, banded together first in little groups for defense and resistance to those who would have forced them into the ranks of the rebel army, and then, recruiting as friends, gathered in one by one of the few in distant communities who remained faithful, came among them to find refuge from persecution, till at last they made up a regiment, and then another, and marched forth to meet and join the Union armies to aid in suppressing the rebellion, reasserting the power of the Federal Government, and restoring that Union for which they had suffered so much and loved so well. And when the day of triumph came and the victor took from them in common with all others their property; when emancipation came, and with it was decreed the civil and political equality of all men; when the colored people were invested with citizenship and suffrage, they submitted to it all. They accepted all in good faith as the price of the nation's life, as a willing sacrifice to the demands of patriotism. Faithful to their country, its Constitution, and laws in this long and fiery ordeal, they rallied to and supported that great party which had preserved the Union with undeviating fidelity. No earthly power could have loosed your hold upon them but the republican party itself. But when you proposed to put the Senate bill upon them; when, as they were told, you proposed to invade the sanctity of their homes and to force social equality upon them; when you proposed to force their children into schools with colored children or deprive them of the benefits of the common schools, the blood of the Anglo-Saxon rebelled, and they turned away from you.

You may say that this is a prejudice but they say it is not, that it is a sentiment; but whether the one or the other it is a fact, and a stubborn fact—one that will not yield to force. If the civil-rights bill which is on your table becomes the law, you will drive these men, whose fidelity to republican principles has been proven by sacrifices and trials to which no northern republican has been subjected, permanently away from you, and you obliterate in a brief time the republican party South. I am not overestimating the danger nor mistaking the result, nor do I underestimate the colored republicans of the South. They will be faithful to you in the future as they have been in the past, as far as it is possible for them to be; but you may environ them with surroundings whose strain may tear loose the bonds that bind them to the republican party. Where are now the hundred thousand colored voters which you once had in the State of Georgia? Where were they at the last election? The poor and the weak must have support and protection, and if they cannot find it in friends they must seek it from enemies; if they cannot maintain their rights they will yield compliance to avert or mitigate wrongs.

This brings me to another objection to the bill of the committee, which is, that it can never be enforced in the South, with a strong and excited public opinion against it, with the entire white population bitterly opposed to its enforcement, with the masses of the colored people recognizing it as the chief agency by which their political strength has been dissipated and their political party destroyed. Will it not be emphatically, as the southern democracy declare your other laws conferring rights upon the colored people shall be, "a dead letter upon the statute-book?"

The substitute I offer avoids all of these evils. It will not only bring back to us the strength which we have lost, but its inherent justice will secure for it public approval in the South, and thereby render it effectual as a protection of these rights of the colored people. But if you pass the Senate bill, or it may be the bill of the committee, though far less objectionable, and I am correct in the consequences which will flow from it, you will then have a consolidated South, its entire white population united against you, irritated and inflamed by the existence of laws which the democratic party South have declared they intend to nullify—"make dead letters upon the statute-book"—engaged in a war of races against a people feeble and weak, who are unable to resist, but whom the United States Government is bound to protect. What then will follow?

Things cannot stop in that unbalanced condition. The nation cannot stand idly by and see its Constitution annulled, its laws defied, and four millions of its people exterminated, nor will the rampant spirit of southern democracy, flushed with success and buoyant with assurance of northern sympathy, stop at the half-way ground. The irrepressible conflict must go on, not between free and slave labor nor between North and South, but between State rights and Federal rights, between clashing systems, between theories which have battled with each other from the foundation of our National Government, and which must go on until definitely and conclusively settled by the assertion of the right and the power of the Federal Government to maintain its dignity and preserve the national life by the protection of its citizens in all their essential and fundamental rights, or by the dissolution of the Government itself. I confess that it is surprising to me that the minds of men, thoughtful, sagacious, and capable men, are so absorbed with commotions and complications which are mere results, superficial manifestations, as to seem not to observe or consider the mighty agencies which, beneath the visible appearances of things, are working out with resistless force and untiring energies the ultimate accomplishment, their final solution and only state of rest—agencies in whose grasp men and parties are mere instrumentalities, to which all mind and purpose and efforts are tributaries, and before whose glacier-like progress all opposition falls away or is ground to powder.

It is said that this issue is settled by the war. That it was not settled by the war and is not settled is palpable to any one who looks at the real issue that is presented by the press and the voice of the country. It is a collision of ideas, a conflict of opinions, which exists to-day as clearly defined in the South and to a very large extent throughout the nation by party lines as it did before the war.

I would like to inquire of complaisant gentlemen here, who send forth to their unapprehensive constituencies the delusive cry of "All is well," what was settled by the war? The attempt to secede now would incur precisely the same perils and penalties, and involve the same disloyalty, that it did in 1861. Was slavery settled by the war? It was in form; but as things are tending now, it will prove only a substitution of the tyranny of law, goaded by the necessities of poverty and want, for the dominion of the master. Or if the proclaimed doctrine of southern democracy (to which I just now called attention) be true, it will prove a lifting up of the colored people from slavery with one hand to turn them over to extinction with the other.

Citizenship of the United States was created by the fourteenth amendment; but what is it? Whether it be anything more than the imputed citizenship of the United States before the war, with its meager investiture of rights, vibrates with uncertain sound in the trembling balance of judicial construction. It is not yet known whether the paramount allegiance which the United States Government claims of its citizens rests upon the power in the Government to maintain and protect them in the safe and effectual rendition of that allegiance, or whether the power of protecting citizens of the United States in all their essential and fundamental rights belongs exclusively to adverse and it may be hostile sovereignties. This last construction would leave this vital and irritating question substantially where it was when it constituted the central conflict of opinions which culminated in the war of 1861.

In the present outlook nothing was settled by the war; and if Congress and the nation are not aroused to the necessity of enforcing the conclusiveness of the past arbitrament, the same political antagonisms which brought about the war of 1861, after a few but sharp collisions in the forum and on the hustings, will again appeal to arms. The southern democrats affect to be very indignant when charged with intending to make another effort at separation. They say the idea is preposterous and the charge false, that secession is dead, with a good deal more of that sort of unctuous protestation; but I have no confidence in these denials. I heard the same character of denials and protestations from the same party and many of the same men in 1850 and 1851 and in 1860, and events proved them to be false, and I have no confidence in them now. I believe the programme is somewhat changed, but the ultimate aim, "a southern confederacy," is the same. The central political idea of the democratic party South is State rights as much now as in the contest of 1860. The General Government is denounced now as a centralized despotism as it was then, only with more bitterness; and its friends and supporters in most of the cotton-growing States are calumniated and persecuted with a vindictiveness which was not approximated in the most violent period before the war. Men were not then ostracized socially, persecuted and hunted down in their private business, or murdered on the public highways by persons lying in wait, or in their own houses by midnight assassins, because they were the friends of the Government or opponents of the secession party.

But let us look at the condition South. It cannot be much longer ignored; and, unpleasant and painful as it may be, it is the part of manhood and the duty of statesmen and patriots to look it squarely in the face. There is rebellion now in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, deliberately and deeply concerted, widely extended, largely sympathized with in many other of the Southern States, and reaching through the democratic party no small portion of the Western and Northern States; rebellion not in form against the Government of the United States, but rebellion against its laws and Constitution, and a determinate and fixed purpose manifested by open declaration and armed force to obstruct the operation of those laws and render them nugatory.

Government rests upon law. The force of law is to government the spirit of life. It is the means of performing its functions as a government, and the power by which it perpetuates its being as well. Upon it, it predicates its claim to allegiance, and exacts obedience, and out of it issues its prestige and authority. With it, government lives, and without it, it dies. This force of law is antagonized by the law of force, which, in form more or less violent and more or less formidable, is ever contending with and seeking to evade or suppress the force of law. This, when limited to the individual, or to a number of individuals, conspired together for the accomplishment of some unlawful but selfish end, some object casual and transient in its nature, is but the normal condition of lawlessness struggling with law and seeking to disregard its commands and to evade its punishments. These carry with them no purpose to overturn the law itself and no impeachment of the authority of the government which ordained it. But when the contest is with the law per se, when it is made by extended combinations and secret organizations united together to resist the law and defeat its enforcement, when it is declared openly as the programme of a party "that they will not attempt the repeal of laws, but, by superior intelligence, stronger muscle, and greater energy, make them dead letters upon the statute book," when these combinations and declarations are manifested in organized armed force, which strips citizens of their rights held by tenure of such laws, takes human life ad libitum, overthrows established State governments by armed force and by lawless intimidation, this is rebellion; it is the substitution of the law of force for the force of law, of the will of the mob for the authority of government, and is a fatal stab at the Government itself. No matter what may be the pretenses or excuses for such conduct, the issue between the perpetrators and the Government is the same—one that rises infinitely above any casual condition or any personal or local grievance. It is an issue of force with the Government itself, in which the Government must maintain the integrity of its authority and enforce its laws or divest itself of its highest attribute, of its very soul, without which it cannot perform the functions of government, but must sink overwhelmed by faction and anarchy.

The reconstruction acts and the amendments to the Constitution conferring citizenship and the rights of citizenship upon the colored people are the immediate objective points of this movement in Southern States to which I have alluded, and beyond and above the ruins which their forcible overthrow will involve, rises to the eye of hopeful and expectant leaders the well-defined and not dimly seen form of a resurrected southern confederacy.

The continued torrent of appeals by the democratic press South to the prejudices of race and party, I have spoken of. These were the malaria of hate with which to infect the masses of the white people, but special organizations were necessary in furtherance of the ultimate design, and these were established first under the name of Ku-Klux Klans in several of the Southern States. For long time their existence was persistently denied by the democratic press South. Their crimes, when so atrocious as to constrain condemnation from democratic papers, were softened or extenuated by a denunciation of the imputed offenses of their victims, and were set down by them as the casual outbreaks of incensed individuals or outraged communities. But when the courts probed these dens of infamy and exposed their hideous atrocities, the democratic press was at once silent upon the subject. They could no longer in the face of hundreds of sworn witnesses, both white and colored, deny the existence of these organizations, and, for reason perhaps best known to themselves, they could not condemn them. I refer now to the press in the cotton States. The Courier-Journal of Louisville did nobly condemn and denounce these lawless associations, but it found little sympathy or support from the democratic press in the South.

Much has been said about the origin of this association and what provoked it into being. By some it is said to have been devised as a counter-organization to the Union Leagues, to the Grand Army of the Republic, &c., and by others to have originated in Tennessee to overawe and suppress radical violence when Governor Brownlow was governor of that State. Whatever may have been the influence of these or any of them in prompting its formation, none of them suggested the idea; that was taken from the southern rights leagues of the secessionists before the war which were so effectual in the South in "firing the southern heart" and preparing the way for secession in 1861. These were the true prototypes of these Ku-Klux Klans and White Leagues or White Brotherhood as they are differently called, for they are the same, differing only in degree as do the different degrees in Masonry.

I will now send to the Clerk to read the oath of a Ku-Klux and the oath of a member of the White League or White Brotherhood.

The Clerk read as follows:

I, A B, do solemnly swear, before Almighty God and in the presence of these my friends here assembled, that I will truly and faithfully keep secret even unto death the plans and movements of this society. I do furthermore swear that I will come at the calling of the first grand council of the mask multitude at any hour of the moon; that I will rattle the dead bones; that I will follow upon the track of the scalawag's blood. I swear that in case of our being interrupted in any civil government, in which we may be operating, I will regard no oath that will convict one of its members, but under all circumstances stand by the order, in oath, death, and blood. In testimony of my faith, I hereupon take upon myself this most solemn and binding obligation, in the presence of three or more honorable and accepted members here present. (Those being initiated kiss the Bible.)

SECOND OATH.

I, A B, do solemnly swear, before Almighty God and in the presence of these my friends here assembled, being fully and seriously impressed with the sacredness of the act, that I never will make known either by word, sign, or deed, my knowledge of its existence. I swear that the enemies of the white man's race and of the white man's government, and the friends of the nigger equality, are now, and forever shall be, my enemies. I swear to obey the chief in all his constitutional orders and all other orders which he may issue by the direction of this society. I swear to kill any member of this society who shall prove false to this oath. I swear to defend the life of every member of this society—even at the risk of my own—should I ever see it in danger. I swear to give my patronage and support to the members of this society, in preference to all others. And, lastly, I swear by this Bible, this skull, and this blood, that, should I ever prove untrue in any one particular to the obligations I have here taken, unreservedly, voluntarily, I hope to become an outcast, an alien to my friends, my country, and my God. All of which, so help me God.

Mr. WHITE. These oaths point emphatically to a "white man's government." It is against the Constitution and laws, declaring the civil and political equality of all men and their supporters, that this powerful and dangerous secret political organization is aimed, in full consonance with the open professions and outward manifestations of the southern democratic party.

The leading feature is that it is a secret, oath-bound political organization, and its terrible efficiency springs from the obligation of implicit obedience to the command of superiors. Like the Old Man of the Mountain, whose fanatical emissaries went forth at the peril of their own lives to strike down prince or peasant, priest or layman, in fatal obedience to the commands of their chief, so, in unquestioning obedience to the command of their superior, who is not even known to them except as their superior, these myrmidons go forth upon their errands of darkness and of blood knowing but one thing, and that is, to do whatever they are commanded. Neither passion nor revenge prompts them, nor law or conscience or pity restrains. All motives, all constraints, are brought into absolute subordination to the one absorbing idea and purpose of the organization—the overthrow of the "nigger government." We have seen this purpose carried to accomplishment in Arkansas. In Louisiana we have seen it pull down the State government and put in its place officers whom the democracy of that State claim were elected to office nearly two years before; and in Mississippi we have seen it at the instigation of an armed mob, over the dead bodies of scores of citizens slain by that mob, seize offices and force men who had been regularly elected to office according to law and by the qualified electors to resign to the mob those offices at the peril of their lives.

Is there another government in the world, or has there ever been a government, or a thing with the name or shadow of a government, which would have quietly stood by and witnessed such violence and atrocities as these without adopting efficient means to repress them and to protect its citizens? Is it because the victims are republicans or because they are colored that we hear from the North in response to the recital of our wrongs that "It is a tale that has been often told." Yes, it has been often told; but not near so often as have been the infliction of the wrongs.

A few years ago the story of Uncle Tom's Cabin, with its large draughts on fancy, was sufficient to thrill the nation with sympathy for the suffering slave. Now the nation turns a deaf ear to wrongs inflicted upon the same people now free citizens of the United States, which in enormity in a single year would outweigh the sufferings of a hundred years of slavery. But in connection with these movements, especially that in Louisiana, there were many significant occurrences in other States, some of which I wish to present, that you may better appreciate the temper of the democratic mind South and the spirit it is instilling into the people there.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Atlanta (Georgia) News.]

Against the fate that confronts us what have the southern people? Is it that "prudence" which such papers as the Louisville Courier-Journal advocates, but which men less gifted than the editor of that paper call a dastardly submission? No! Our only hope is in a stern, resolute resistance—a resistance to the death, if necessary, with arms in our hands. Let there be "White Leagues" formed in every town, village, and hamlet of the South, and let us organize for the great struggle which seems to be inevitable. If the October elections which are to be held at the North are favorable to the radicals, the time will have arrived for us to prepare for the very worst. The radicalism of the republican party must be met by the radicalism of white men. We have no war to make against the United States Government, but against the republican party our hate must be unquenchable, our war interminable and merciless. Fast fleeting away is the day for wordy protests and idle appeals to the magnanimity of the republican party.

By brute force they are endeavoring to force us into acquiescence to their hideous programme. We have submitted long enough to indignities, and it is time to meet brute force with brute force. Every southern State should swarm with White Leagues, and we should stand ready to act the moment Grant signs the civil-rights bill. It will not do to wait until radicalism has fettered us to the car of social equality before we make an effort to resist it. The signing of the bill will be a declaration of war against the southern whites. It is our duty to ourselves, it is our duty to our children, it is our duty to the white race, whose prowess subdued the wilderness of this continent, whose civilization filled it with cities and towns and villages, whose mind gave it power and grandeur, and whose labor imparted to it prosperity, and whose love made peace and happiness dwell within its homes, to take up the gage of battle the moment it is thrown down.

If the white democrats of the North are men, they will not stand idly by and see us borne down by northern radicals and half-barbarous negroes. But no matter what they may do, it is time for us to organize. We have been temporizing long enough. Let northern radicals understand that military supervision of southern elections and the civil-rights bill mean war, that war means bloodshed, and that we are terribly in earnest, and even they, fanatical as they are, may retrace their steps before it is too late.

THE RACE CONFLICT MEANS THAT WHITES MUST BE RULERS.

The troubles in the South to-day are due solely to the claims made by the blacks of equality with the whites. Such an equality will not be tolerated. All the arguments of theorists will not reconcile the whites to equality with the negroes. The antagonism is instinctive. Whether right or wrong it exists without any visible means of destroying its existence.

Call it what you may—prejudice, antagonism, brutality, barbarism—it exists. On but one condition can the whites and blacks live amicably together. The whites must be rulers, and their position must be that of superiors both socially and politically.

This is not the brutem fulmen of political hate; it is more the solemn asseveration of an instinctive determination.

When the blacks are placed in their proper position of subordination to the whites, we will not hear any more of violence to them. The moment they accept as final the fact of their subordination, self-interest, duty, humanity, will throw around them as perfect a protection against violence from any quarter as a father would throw around a child. But so long as the negro aspires to rule white men politically, and to consort with them socially on terms of equality, so long will he be subjected to the storm which his own presumption provokes.

We sicken at heart at the contemplation of the misery which threatens Alabama, Louisiana, and South Carolina. Grant's last act shuts the door to all hope that he will veto the civil-rights bill. Nay, more; it gives to the impending conflict of races a deeper, wider, and more horrible significance; for if the whites of the States we have named, driven to desperation by the prospect of the continued rule of negroes, were to resist the Federal forces, the first resistance would be likely to prove the first spark which would fire the train of another civil war—not of sections, but of political parties.

An overwhelming majority of the white men of this country are hostile to a continuation of the rule of the negro and white adventurer in the South. If the Federal Government will keep its hands off, November next will witness the downfall of the black oligarchy. If it persists in its interference, then, in view of the almost certain success of the civil-rights bill, we believe it time for southern men everywhere to organize and prepare for revolution. Let us stand ready to resist the enforcement of the civil-rights bill, and the maintenance of negro governments by Federal bayonets. And when the contest does begin, let us call upon those of the northern people who sympathize with us, to give us their aid in tearing down the infamous radical government which seeks to force eight millions of white men down to a level with four millions of negroes. If force alone can destroy the radical party, then we must not shrink from using it, and the sooner it is used the earlier will be terminated the political struggles which are retarding the development of the South, and injuring the entire country.

Mr. WHITE. A. J. P. Garesche, a prominent lawyer in Saint Louis, at a sympathizing meeting held in that city on the 15th, said:

You will bear me witness that I do not urge the people to fight, but I do say that if Louisiana is to be drenched in blood, better let every one of her people die than submit to the usurpation of a government that the President may force upon an unwilling people; and I wish it proclaimed that while I am no man to urge civil commotion and sedition, I say as an American citizen, the protection of the liberties of the people of Louisiana will be cheaply bought if they have to lay down upon the soil of their State the blood of every son whose heart ever beat responsive to the call to defend their rights. My sympathies are with this people, and my purse is open to them, and if in their struggle the President dares to interfere, I say, "Let slip the dogs of war, and damned be he who first cries hold, enough."

I do not forget how Kellogg got into power, sneaking under the guns of a United States frigate, and he now sinks from the outraged people whom he has persecuted and oppressed, and sneaks into the United States custom-house under the protection of Casey, the brother-in-law of Ulysses the First. I say let him go, and let Grant provoke the contest; let him send his regiments, let him expose the Texas frontier to the attacks of Indians, and send ten thousand troops there, they cannot stay the arm of the people of Louisiana. If liberty is to be suppressed, if the free State governments are to be wiped out by the dictates of an imperial government residing at Washington, then tyranny may be ours if we do not choose to obey the imperial mandate. I know what resolutions you have passed, but if you have not passed this resolution, embody it now, that if it be necessary for the struggle of Louisiana and the triumph of State sovereignty in Louisiana, involving the perpetuation of our own liberties, I say let every man in this crowd swear, as I am willing to swear, that all my aid will be given to protect them in this struggle which they will maintain against the authorities and against the Government of the United States.

We have stood in silence, we have submitted to every wrong, we have seen the people outraged, we have seen the people murdered and persecuted and their women ravished, and I say now, there is nothing left but honor or dishonor, and better die than submit to dishonor. It is a question of do or die. They have unfurled their flag and taken as their motto "He who would be free must himself strike the blow." I tell you with all sobriety, God speed Louisiana, and if she wants troops or money, let her call on the Union, and let the Union respond, for it is "the battle-cry of freedom." It is a craven thought that would urge upon us "O, it is not our battle." It is our battle. Let one State be flung from the Union and put under the heel of the despot, and I say every man who submits to it and sanctions the principle proposes his own neck for the halter. I hope that that old creole blood that has never proved itself recreant, against which the finger of cowardice has never yet been pointed on the battle-field, will proclaim that death it may be, but dishonor it never shall be; and if the President sends his minions there, let the President's minions beware, for they may be damned after.

GENERAL SHIELDS'S SPEECH.

General Shields said: Before I announce the adjournment of the meeting, I wish to say that we know not what a day may bring forth. I ask you to go to your homes prepared to come together at any moment, to assemble here again not only as you have to-night, but ten times the number! We know not what we may be called upon to do to aid our suffering brethren in Louisiana; but I am sure, from the manifestations you have made to-night, that whatever the call may be, if it is in furtherance of right and justice and opposed to oppressions, the people of Saint Louis and citizens of Missouri will never fail to respond to it

LOYALTY TO BE ENFORCED BY THE BAYONET.

"We whipped those rebels, we pardoned them, traitors though they were; but now they are practicing the same tactics that they were in 1861. We made 'treason odious' at the point of the bayonet, and I think it is high time that we should compel loyalty again by the same means."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Yes, you made treason very odious. You gave Longstreet a custom-house. You invite Mosby to the White House. You enable Moses to steal. You will pat any rebel on the back who joins your party, and will tell lies by the bushel upon those who have opinions of their own. You had better cease your vapor about the bayonet. Your people are not ready to lose another million of men and roll up another debt of two billions in order to keep a few thieves in office at the South.—Mobile Register.

MILITARY RULE PREFERABLE.

The stolid and remorseless executor of reconstruction has once more thrust his ill-omened visage in the path of the peace and happiness of the southern people. He treats the people of Louisiana as a mob to be "dispersed," and the frightened thief, Kellogg, as the governor of that Commonwealth. In a word, the Army of the United States is to be used to pin the intelligence and the worth of Louisiana to earth, while a pack of villains, who obtained their power by a fraud, (admitted by the Congress of the United States,) is to continue to prey upon their hearts as well as their means of subsistence. The proclamation places a great responsibility upon the leaders of the Louisiana people. For the moment, removed from the actual danger of the crisis, it is not for us to advise their course. They have already exhibited a wisdom and a resolution that must be equal to the crisis, even though it is met with the last and direct resort of a people outdone and overtaxed by tyrannical wrong. So the sovereignty of Louisiana is mercifully accorded "five days" to "disperse," and great destinies, we know, have been changed in "five days."

This people might well say, "We submit to the power of the United States because we are helpless to resist it; "but to the government of Kellogg, the felon and the usurper, we will not submit. Military rule is preferable to the domination of a civil and public robber. To compel the latter, we give you warning that you must send an army here, and quarter a regiment in every parish of our State. We will yield to force, but not to its shadow; to its reality, but not to its theory. Our lordly President, whose power so many stupid asses propose to extend to a third term, sends troops to the frontier to punish savage thieves, and orders the same troops to Louisiana to sustain a band of felons whose villainy Indians could not learn to equal in a lifetime. For Grant's sake we do not regret his proclamation. It will end in his political disgrace and downfall, and put him in history alongside of his favorite, Governor Kellogg. Let the friends of liberty stand all the more firm as tyranny rears its crest to more damnable deeds. Grant has made the blunder of his life, and the truth of it will be taught to him by the American people. They are slow to make up their political judgments, but once formed they stand.—Mobile Register.

MILITARY RULE IS WHAT THE WHITE PEOPLE OF LOUISIANA WANT.

Grant and his man Williams, and his brother-in-law Casey, created the Kellogg government which the Senate of the United States solemnly declared a usurpation, without shadow of law or right to support it. The people of Louisiana have risen in their might to throw it off. There cannot be a whole-souled man in Georgia whose heart does not beat in sympathy with this heroic effort to sweep away the leeches that the Administration has fastened on a once prosperous and happy people. For years they have tried to cast them off in a peaceable manner, but whenever events were favorable there came the gleam of opposing Federal bayonets. The recent dispatch of troops by Grant and his Attorney-General to Louisiana was but a part of the despotic programme that has been pursued from the beginning.

Nice distinctions about constituted authorities are valueless in such a crisis as this. We have reason to believe that the people of Louisiana do not hope for a government of their own. They only hope to clear out the gang that are eating out their vitals, and then submit to military rule. Information was received here nearly a week ago that such was the plan of the white people of Louisiana, and that it would be enforced.

The monotonous revolution concerns us all, but we cannot too strongly urge that cool common sense is altogether the best article in perilous times. No outbreak has occurred in Georgia, and none need be apprehended if discretion is exercised and hot-headed ineffectual zeal discountenanced. Our whole hearts go out to the suffering people of Louisiana, and that is all the aid we can now bring them. If any opportunity presents itself, we may be sure that Governor Smith will not hesitate to put us on the right line. Let us trust him, and keep cool heads and steady nerves.—Atlanta Constitution.

'The rebels have proved themselves to be rebels now as thoroughly and as uncompromisingly as when they fought under Beauregard and when they were in the ranks of the confederate battalions. What assurance can they give that they will not repeat their crime again to-morrow, or next week, or next month?"—Washington Republican.

Yes, the Louisiana people are as great rebels to-day as the people of Massachusetts were in 1776. They can give no assurances that they will not "repeat their crime again to-morrow, or next week, or next month." On the contrary, they intend to repeat it again and again so often as the United States troops are absent. And in repeating it they will have the indorsement of every honest man from Maine to California.—Mobile Register.

There is no mistaking the import of utterances like these. They indicate a purpose, even at the peril of another civil war, by force and intimidation, to seize the State governments of the South, to expel the colored people and all the friends of the colored people from office there, and to deprive the colored people of the right of free suffrage and of every other right which is distasteful to them, and establish in all these States a white man's government. This can be done only—and none know this better than they who intend it—by trampling under foot the laws and Constitution of the United States.

As this dangerous and defiant scheme expands and develops at the South, we see everywhere asserting its ascendency over the popular mind the doctrine of State rights, and coming to the front the men who in 1861 led the van-guard of secession. Of the executive committee of the democratic party in Alabama, consisting of twenty-one members, there are nine who were active and conspicuous secessionists in 1861, several of them members of the secession convention; eight others equally pronounced as belonging to the extreme State-rights school, but not old enough to have been conspicuous in 1861; while all over the State the old secession leaders entered into the canvass of last fall with a unanimity and ardor not approximated since the war, and not equaled by the fiery contest of 1860. With these men and that considerable portion of the people which enabled them to plunge the State into secession in 1861 the right of a State to secede from the Union was a conviction—a right for which they went to war and deluged the country with blood. Have they given any evidence that their opinions are changed. Force may break the spirit and make the suppliant bend; it cannot master the mind. Their opinions are now what they were, and had been for many years, before 1861, only stronger and more cherished for having been, as they conceive, crushed to earth by arbitrary power.

The lost cause is dearer to them because it is lost. With it lie buried their proudest hopes and round it cluster their most hallowed memories. Pride, honor, glory, patriotism, ambition, all encircle its tomb and strew it with votive offerings.

The people of the North are in the habit of regarding the abolition of slavery as the removal of the great cause of dissension between the North and the South, (this will be in time, to a large extent;) but they seem to forget that in that very act, which fell upon all in the South, friends as well as enemies of the Government, a loss of thousands of millions of property was inflicted. That by the war the people of the South were made poor and their land desolate. That the upheaval of their social relations and unsettled political condition, with the unavoidably rude crucial of reconstruction, have multiplied many fold the sources of irritation, which demagogues may ply "to inflame the southern mind and fire the southern heart, and again precipitate the people into revolution."

When there is added to these the bitterness of a race issue, the end of which it is boldly avowed must be extermination or ruin, it may be readily comprehended that the situation is perilous in the extreme. The majority of the people of the South now, as in 1861, do not wish to become involved in war with their Government; but now, as in 1861, the violent and extreme lead the way, others follow in the whirl of excitement, and upon the swollen currents good men are borne along, catching more or less the contagion around them, until some critical event may again eliminate from the heated controversies of party the sectional antagonisms which wrapt our land in the flames of civil war in 1861.

The incredulity with which men North and South fettered and blinded their minds to the real purposes of these southern secession leaders in 1861 is being repeated now. The warnings now uttered are unheeded, as they were then; and if this apathy both North and South is not shaken off and the country aroused to a sense of its true condition, our people will ere long be waked by the bursting flames of revolution and civil war which in the fury of its conflicts will parallel the depths and intensity of the moral antagonisms which foreshadow it.

But while the nation has been thoughtless and indifferent, while the perils of the hour seemed to have attracted small attention and excited little interest in the minds of many of the guardians of the nation's life and honor, there is one who has been vigilant and faithful, amid the heaving billows of deep unrest which underlie our condition, and the dark portents that are gathering upon our political sky, the pilot placed at the helm by a people's suffrages, still holds the ship "that bears the fortunes of the Republic" steadily on her course. Recognizing the Constitution as his guide, the law as the means, and justice as the end, the President treads the perilous edge of his exalted duties with firm step and unshaken nerve. No dangers appal, no pretenses beguile him, no blandishments seduce, no opposition intimidates, no false security lulls him to inaction. He has sounded the note of warning, and the people will heed. The spirit that awoke in response to the firing on Sumter will again electrify the nation; and if seconded by Congress, the party that rescued the country in 1861 will now preserve it; will save it from misrule, from civil war, from the control of the men and the party who so lately conspired to destroy it, and will reaffirm and establish upon peaceful and assured foundations justice and right, law and liberty, and the civil and political equality of all men. These are the fundamental principles of our Government, and must be maintained, or the Government itself must fail. In these are involved no invasion of social rights, no social equality enforced by law, but only a community of those political rights which constitute the incidents of freedom under our free institutions.

But this is not to be accomplished by the enactment of a civil-rights bill, (which may add fuel to the flame and make more deplorable the condition of those it is intended to benefit,) but can only be effected by vigorous, decisive, pungent action, commensurate with the opposition to be encountered and the perils to be overcome, by measures which will make the laws which confer citizenship upon the colored people and pronounce the civil and political equality of all men living principles and a governing power, not "dead letters upon the statute-book."

We are on the verge of a crisis. The decisive moment is rapidly advancing upon us in which the results of the war shall be affirmed as assured and recognized facts, or its fearful issues will be reopened again to distract the popular mind with party strife made more rancorous by the bitter memories that darken its past conflicts, and more ominous from the conviction that such party antagonisms can reach no final adjustment but by appeal to the dread arbitrament to which these issues drove the country in 1861.

Which direction events shall take depends upon the republican members of this Congress. The responsibility is upon us. The President has done his whole duty, and upon us devolves the fate of the nation.

The people recognize this fact, and to us they look as their accredited public servants, invested with power and clothed with authority, for safety and deliverance. It is a fearful but a most honorable responsibility. If we fail to realize its imminent magnitude or fail to come up to the full measure of its demands in spirit, thought, and action, shame black as the gloom and heavy as the sorrows which our indifference shall bring upon our country will be ours; but if with "the eye to see and the heart to dare," inspired by a deep devotion to the public good, we rise to the level of our exalted duties, and discharge them fearlessly, faithfully, and wisely, we shall be crowned with honors by an appreciative and grateful people.

Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

SPEECH OF HON. ROBERT B. VANCE,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole upon the President's annual message—

Mr. VANCE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: To-day when I arose in my place and offered the following amendment to the post-office appropriation bill—

After line 39, page 3, insert:

For payment of the amounts due southern mail contractors to 26th May, 1861, $370,977.17—

the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] in charge of the bill raised the point of order that it conflicted with existing law, and had the following joint resolution read at the Clerk's desk:

Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until otherwise ordered it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government to pay any account, claim, or demand against said Government which accrued or existed prior to the 13th day of April, A. D. 1861, in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who during said rebellion was not known to be opposed thereto and distinctly in favor of its suppression; and no pardon heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted shall authorize the payment of such account, claim, or demand until this resolution is modified or repealed: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of claims founded upon contract made by any of the Departments, where such claims were assigned or contracted to be assigned prior to April 1, 1861, to creditors of said contractors, loyal citizens of loyal States, in payment of debts incurred prior to March 1, 1861.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the war has been at an end, so far at least as fighting is concerned, for ten years; the President of the United States issued his proclamation of peace; General Grant has uttered his celebrated sentence, "Let us have peace," and still, after fourteen years' waiting, when a Representative of the people asks for the payment of an honest debt—simply the principal, without interest—he is confronted with this horrid monster "existing law" with its hydra head, and is compelled to quietly resume his seat because he cannot help himself, and he reluctantly comes to believe in his heart that gentlemen regard it as a good thing.

How long is this state of things to last? The southern people have submitted most cheerfully to all kinds of taxation in order to carry on the National Government and to pay the national debt. Not only so, but they have agreed that the wounded and disabled Union soldier shall have a pension and the widow of the fallen shall not be forgotten. This, too, when our own soldiers have nothing for their support save what they make by their own toil, and the widow of the fallen gray has nothing but what she receives from her warm-hearted but poor neighbors.

Thank God, Mr. Speaker, for that "one touch of nature" which "makes the whole world kin," and which is willing still to divide the crust of bread and the cup of water. Look, if you please, how the South has been taxed—her cotton, her spirits, her tobacco; and in turn the tax has been laid upon the goods she had to buy, not being a manufacturer. The internal revenue and the tariff have ground the face of the poor to powder. The taxes have been paid, sir; our people are endeavoring to be in all things true and faithful to the best interests of the Government; and I ask is it not a burning shame and a national disgrace that the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, should be flouted in their faces? They are not beggars. They are the honest creditors of this Government. They simply ask to be paid a just debt, contracted for by the head of a Department and by authority of law. Why, Mr. Speaker, this very day there is pending before this body a new tax bill, which proposes to raise the tax on tobacco and other southern products, and no doubt but the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, will be thundering in our ears by Thursday of this week more taxes upon southern products. How can he do this thing and yet these very people not allowed even to have their claims considered? But gentlemen cry out "existing law!" Yes, that is the cry. Why, Mr. Speaker, when I said let us consider the amount due these people they bristled up around me like the warriors of Roderick Dhu around the astonished Fitz James.

But why does this law exist? It was saddled upon the people eight years ago, and certainly gentlemen have had time plenty to repeal it or to modify it. Was it originally intended as a punishment to southern people? If so, it seems to me that the time of punishment has been long enough. Was it to make our people loyal? If so, I regard it as the greatest of errors. What, forever keep before the eye of a child that which you regarded as a wrong in him? Is that the idea of a wise parent toward his child? Is it wise policy and good statesmanship to keep forever before the southern people the evidence that they had a war? Surely they have that mournfully enough in every southern home, where death has claimed the fairest and best. Yea, they have that in their own melancholy memories, as they call up that solemn period when they almost felt they had nothing left—

> But broken rings, and tresses of hair,
> And garments our dead used to wear.

But, sir, if the object of oaths and "existing laws" be for the purpose of making people loyal, it is a fatal error.

What is the true policy to pursue toward a people with whom you have been at variance? It is, if you have said lay down your arms and come back, (exactly our case,) to receive them with a spirit of magnanimity as your equals (a thing you will not and cannot deny) and treat them justly. The safety of our great country is in the love and devotion of the people to our Constitution and Government. The glory of our country consists in the fact, as we have always been taught, that it is a Government of consent, and not one of force. Hence the wisdom of equal laws and full protection to all. How can you love that which oppresses you? How can the heart thrill with delight at the mention of a thing which pretends to be its friend and benefactor, when in fact it seems to be seeking in every possible way to make you feel degraded and outlawed?

If you wish the people to be true—and I like that term better than I do the word loyal—you must extend over them the broad mantle of protection and encouragement.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, when a governor of North Carolina so far ignored his oath of office, and the constitution of his State and nation, as to send armed men to make arrests of peaceable citizens while at labor in their fields, and to plunge them into filthy dungeons contrary to law, that the persecuted and imprisoned people applied for the writ of habeas corpus. This was granted, but the governor refused to obey its sacred mandate, and held his prisoners in durance vile. Then the supreme court of North Carolina declared "the power of the judiciary exhausted," and no relief seemed at hand for our oppressed fellow-citizens. To the surprise and joy of the people a distinguished judge of the United States court became the means of their deliverance. I was at Raleigh, North Carolina, when several of these gentlemen were released, and a vast concourse of people received them on the public square. The Stars and Stripes were unfurled above the grand stand for public speaking, and when the people saw that it was in this instance an ensign of protection and not of oppression, they shouted until the earth trembled beneath them. So it will be evermore, my word for it, Mr. Speaker. You can never make the people love the Government by passing laws and horrid test-oaths of loyalty, which perpetually remind them that you do not trust them, that they must pay taxes and never murmur, and then be refused even to have their claims considered. This thing is wrong, and cries to the Congress of the United States for a change. Now, Mr. Speaker, who are excluded from the benefits of the Government by these enactments?

First, I will mention the dear old soldiers of the war of 1812—men who upheld the honor of our flag and suffered and bled for their country before the men were born who passed the laws dropping them from the pension-rolls. Can any man with half a heart forget these venerable men? Can any one forget how they still shoulder their crutches and show how fields are won? Never! Surely, never!

Now, what do I find among the rules of this Christian country? Applying at the Pension Department for papers to reinstate a soldier of 1812 upon the rolls, I was handed a paper containing the following:

That he has not borne arms against the Government of the United States, or in any manner aided or abetted the rebellion, or those prosecuting the rebellion, or manifested a sympathy with their cause; but, on the contrary, did, during the said rebellion, earnestly desire its suppression by force of arms.

This caps the climax! Here is an old soldier, say ninety years old, (and there are a few left of that age,) who is required to swear that he had no sympathy with his son—the son being of age and going into the war of his own accord; that he had not sent him a pair of socks or any other garment to protect him in the winter campaign. More than that, he (a Christian man) is compelled to swear that he desired the rebellion suppressed by force of arms. In other words, he is compelled to swear upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God that his desire was for the war to press fiercely forward through tears, blood, and death to a successful issue for the Federal party. God deliver me, Mr. Speaker, from so bloody a desire!

See further; even if the old soldier can take the oath, here is a man who dislikes him, and he, snakelike, strikes him in his back by a charge that he is disloyal. I see the man now preparing to make his charge. He is a heavy-set man, with dark hair and forbidding countenance. He is a Federal office-holder, and his heart is as full of gall and wormwood as possible. He secretly stabs the old soldier, who is dropped from the rolls, and that is the end of it.

The soldiers who followed the victorious banners of Scott and Taylor in Mexico are also dropped from the rolls.

Now, a few words about the mail contractors in the South, who carried the mails for the Government up to 26th May, 1861. It was a regular contract between them and the Government. The accounts have been audited by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. They are recognized as just. Not to pay them is the repudiation of an honest debt, and I presume that the doctrine of repudiation is not popular with the party in power.

There are also the unpaid quartermaster claims. In the year 1865 the people furnished supplies to the Army and took regular vouchers therefor. This was after the war had closed and the southern soldiers had returned home, according to the terms of surrender. Now the Departments refuse to pay these debts, on the ground that the parties were disloyal. How can a man be disloyal who has surrendered and taken the oath of allegiance, which carries with it a promise of protection to life and property? In order to be disloyal, then, he must have committed some new act of hostility to the Government—a charge, if made, that cannot be sustained against our people.

Now I respectfully appeal to gentlemen to aid in the good work of repealing these obnoxious features. It will be a graceful thing for the Forty-third Congress to do before its day of final adjournment shall arrive. It will be a good thing for us all to do that which leaves a pleasure and not a sting behind it. It is my purpose to afford gentlemen an opportunity to put themselves right on the record touching this matter, as I design next Monday to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of repealing the acts referred to.

The Usurpation and Failures of the Republican Party.

SPEECH OF HON. T. T. CRITTENDEN,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. CRITTENDEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I speak to-day upon the failure of the republican party to restore peace and give contentment to the people of this country. I do it "with malice toward none" and with a love for this country, for its flag, for its form of government, second to no one in this House. Believing that secession was wrong, that it would be detrimental to the interests of all the people, would do much to mar the simplicity of our relationship as people toward the Government and of the Government toward the States, I opposed it in society and upon the field of battle with an honest purpose and mature deliberation. I hoped that when the war was over, when peace was declared, under the new order of things in the South those people and those States, impoverished and weak, would in that magnanimity always graceful in the conqueror be permitted to adjust their broken parts to this strong Government under the Constitution and in accordance with the elevated sentiment of justice of mankind. They are of our blood and our bone, and asked only to be treated as such. They had paid in blood and fortune the heavy penalty of a wrong step, and with a courage of energy equaling their courage in battle they returned to a quiet industry and only asked the consideration of a possessed citizenship. Had the republican party met them in the same spirit to-day all would be well in this country, and it would indeed have fulfilled the solemn declarations of its platform and of its great men. That party has pursued a different policy, and I shall now undertake to show the results, being prostrate States, bankrupt people, the glisten of the bayonet everywhere, corrupt officials, debased judiciary, and an extravagant Government. Such a combination of evils has produced their natural fruits.

Sir, whenever a party, whether democratic or republican, arrives at the conclusion that it is the Government, that it is above the people, that all the machinery by which the Government is moved is theirs of right, and that it must be kept in motion merely for the purpose of perpetuating itself in power irrespective of the wants of the people and without any consideration for the minority, then it is time for the people to strike it down as a foe to liberty and an enemy to freedom. Has not the republican party arrived at that conclusion? Is not its President, the head and front of that party, making this a personal administration? In fact, is he not the Administration, and are we not rapidly approaching the time when he will declare himself the Government and then scorn that Constitution that was to our fathers the guiding star through so many years of trials and success? Some one may say, as it is often said, that the party is not responsible for the President's personalisms, for his assumptions of unauthorized power, and for his astounding inconsistencies. Those words are easily said, sir; but are they true?

The Presidents heretofore have been at the heads of their parties, by general consent dictating or molding a policy in harmony with the principles upon which that party was founded, and seldom if ever departing from those principles. Whether the sentiments enunciated by him or the acts performed were his own thoughts or his own deeds unadvised and unindorsed, it is immaterial; they at once became the "acts and deeds" of his party, and the country so considered them. It was certainly the case unless they were disclaimed by the party, by its leading representatives in and out of Congress. When President Johnson deemed it of a higher obligation, a higher duty to adhere to the Constitution of his country, to adopt a policy that would reclaim in love and allegiance those peoples, those States that had marched under a strange flag up to the very shadows of the Capitol, rather than follow in the erratic track of some excited leader like Thad. Stevens, or yield his ideas of right and justice to a Congress made violent by success and intemperate by ambition, you the republican party arraigned him for "high crimes and misdemeanors," and attempted to brand him a felon before the world. Ay, sir, your party then and there closed "the gates of honor" upon that heroic man who dared to love the Constitution—

> Turning out
> The Roman from his birthright; and for what?
> To fling your offices to every slave.

And then you gathered to your ranks a man of equal nerve and will, who has made that same Constitution the plaything of the bayonet, the foot-ball of power, and not one in this House belonging to the dominant party has the nerve, the manhood to even question the right of this "silent man" to rule as he pleases. "Send my boots to Stockholm," said Charles XII. "For what, sire?" asked the minister. "To preside at the sessions of the senate." These were the words of a great military leader, and fully indicate their own meaning. But are they any more significant of a disposition "bent on mischief" to our form of government than these words of the President spoken through his Secretary of War:

> The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

What course? The declarations of war by a rash general of the United States Army against an innocent people, proclaiming them in his own recklessness and in his own ignorance "banditti," and asking the power to murder them at will. This too, sir, ten years after peace has been declared in this country; ten years after those people, those States, had passed under republican rule; ten years after the passage of the renowned reconstruction acts; ten years after the carpet-baggers, "those plagues of Egypt," had assumed the control of those States; and ten years after those States had been robbed and desecrated by those missionaries of an excessive loyalty. I am no apologist for the crimes of those people. Doubtlessly many have been committed in those States that are unjustifiable, bald, bold, naked acts of murder and violence unworthy of the age and exceeding the moving cause. Yet are not such crimes occurring daily in every State in this Union? Let your daily journals speak. In the language of Grattan I say:

> If there were crimes committed, they were excited by you. I think now, as I thought then, the treason of ministers against the liberty of the people is much more culpable than the rebellion of the people against ministers.

These, sir, are words spoken in the British Parliament by of one Ireland's greatest orators in defense of his own people, who had been driven to desperation by the fit prototypes of such creatures as now despoil the South. They are true to the very letter. The crimes that have been committed in the South by those to the manor born have been excited by those unrepresentative men of the North who went South during and after the war to glut their vicious appetites upon the fairest and most prolific resources of that goodly land. History, with its long line of infamous characters who have "linked their names to their crimes" and emblazoned their names to eternal infamy, furnishes one striking character that those spoliators of the South should canonize as their patron saint, and that one is Verres; who in three years after he obtained the administration of Sicily, then "the richest and most highly favored province of the republic of Rome, amassed enormous wealth, and fairly rendered that island desolate by his rapacity." Victory tainted in the estimation of the robber the wealth and beauty of the island. This man was driven to an execrable fate nearly two thousand years ago by the senate of Rome for thus plundering a foreign province.

How differently does the Senate of the United States view the legions of Verres now sacking and withering South Carolina, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida—States (such as they are) of our own Union, peopled with our own blood, "kith and kin;" and of those States, South Carolina was one of the original thirteen that declared for independence, "and from the very commencement of the Revolution up to its close there was no sacrifice however great she did not cheerfully make, no service she ever hesitated to perform!" Should not such a history win some pity, some protection for her now? That class of men, sir, under the garb and disguise of loyalty, are the pets and wards of the republican party; and it seems to outside observers that the more abandoned they are, the more unscrupulous they are in securing wealth, the more disregardful they are of the rights of the people in the South, the more facile they are in manipulating the ballot-box, the more corrupt the judges are in issuing midnight orders, bloated with whisky and scented by debauch, the more reckless the marshals are in serving party purposes, the more all such classes are elevated by the party and fêted by the President. Can you point me to one instance where such characters have been reprobated and condemned by this Administration, unless driven to do so by public sentiment and by an ignoble fear of future defeats? I do not charge all connected with this Administration with an indorsement of such constant lawlessness. I only ask those that disapprobate it to dissent openly and boldly, that we may be able to distinguish the one from the other, the saint from the sinner, the patriot from the partisan.

Is not the South in a miserable condition in consequence of such a misrule? Is it not in a worse condition than on the day that Lee surrendered his army to that of the United States? Their labor was disorganized; their homes, their plantations had gone to decay; their machinery and farming utensils had fallen to pieces; their stock had been removed for war purposes; their financial condition was even worse than was that of our fathers under the continental system. An air of desolation pervaded those States, standing ready to be dismantled, "childless and crownless in their voiceless woe." Yet amid all of this wreck hope was left to them, and to the brave and beautiful it always inspires an energy equal to the situation. And, sir, it did more than this, it rekindled a love for the old Union of States, for the old flag of a united country in the hearts of those people as they returned from another allegiance, and made them even love the power that had smitten them. President Johnson, fully comprehending the motive of those people and their sentiments even in their ruin, desired that the world should know them as he did from the pen of their conqueror. In 1865 he sent General Grant through the Southern States to examine into the condition of those States and to report to him. In that report General Grant said:

I am satisfied that the mass of the thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. * * * * * * * * * My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in desiring to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens; and that if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith.

Was General Grant right then? Certainly he was. It was the calm, dispassionate report of the general, not of the politician, who reported men and things as they were. It will not do to say that he was mistaken, that he blundered, that the refinements of society had colored the report. Under such circumstances to blunder was to commit a crime. No, sir. Mr. Speaker, that report, uninfluenced by political ambition, must stand forever as the matured opinion of the general, and nothing that the President can do will ever wipe it from the records of his official life. It does simple justice to those brave people—then and now; and if the honor of the soldier is observed, let the President "stand by the record." Does he do so? We say not; and we say that there is a well-concealed reason why he does not. The President is at the head of the republican party—in fact, as before stated, he assumes to be the party—with the Army and Navy and office-holders at his back, and must maintain its success, even if States, peoples, and constitutions are overthrown by the effort. He sees that as a political organization based upon great fundamental principles it is a failure, and made so by his acts, and that the people of the North are deserting the ranks of that party, and unless they are reclaimed in some way the bayonet will be uncloaked too soon and his daring ambition foiled in its aspirations. The Legislature of Louisiana was to meet on the 4th day of January, 1875, and a majority of its members elected were democrats.

In 1872 that same State was made to play an important part in galvanizing the republican party into life under the decree of a debased Federal judge, and it must again resuscitate the party by the same intervention in 1875 and prevent a democratic majority from assuming quiet possession of the State. How was this to be prevented and how was the public mind to be prepared to acquiesce in the proposed design? On the 2d day of December, 1874, William W. Belknap sent the following "confidential" telegram to General P. H. Sheridan at Chicago, Illinois:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 2, 1874.

GENERAL: The President sent for me this morning, and desires me to say to you that he wishes you to visit the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and especially New Orleans, in Louisiana, and Vicksburgh and Jackson, in Mississippi, and ascertain for yourself, and for his information, the general condition of matters in those localities. You need not confine your visit to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and may extend your trip to other States—Alabama, &c.,—if you see proper; nor need you confine your visit in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to the places named. What the President desires is to ascertain the true condition of affairs, and to receive such suggestions from you as you may deem advisable and judicious.

Inclosed herewith is an order authorizing you to assume command of the Military Division of the South, or of any portion of that division, should you see proper to do so. It may be possible that circumstances may arise which would render this a proper course to pursue. You can, if you desire it, see General McDowell in Louisville, and make known to him confidentially the object of your trip; but this is not required of you. Communication with him by you is left entirely to your own judgment.

Of course you can take with you such gentlemen of your staff as you wish, and it is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business, for the fact of your mere presence in the localities referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect.

The President thinks, and so do I, that a trip South might be agreeable to you, and that you might be able to obtain a good deal of information on the subject about which we desire to learn. You can make your return by Washington and make a verbal report, and also inform me from time to time of your views and conclusions.

Yours, truly, &c.,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

That telegram is written with peculiar craftiness and is full of "significant expressions." Why was it sent to Sheridan instead of McDowell, who was already the commander of that department? And why was General Sherman, then domiciled at Saint Louis, the active Commander-in-Chief of the United States Army, overlooked or omitted? If the President desired "judicious suggestions," why did he not send a man capable of making such suggestions? Ah! sir, the President knew his man; one whose brain could conceive of no law but that of arms; one whose heart shuddered at nothing so much as peace; and that man was General Sheridan. Upon his arrival at New Orleans General Sheridan forwarded to the Secretary of War the following telegram, which seems to have been prepared for the occasion as a part of the bloody drama "to fire the northern heart:"

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 4, 1875. (Received 4—11.45 p. m.)

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized, that unless something is done to give protection to the people all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

This telegram was sent and received on the very day that the Legislature was to meet, and it was sent within three days after his arrival in New Orleans. Few men, even greater than Sheridan, could grasp the condition of a State within such few hours.

But, sir, the last telegram was only a part of the desperate game, and only foreshadowed what was in the fertile brain of that Claverhouse of the Army. Here is the telegram that exhibits the whole plot, and that makes mankind stand aghast the world over:

Telegram dated headquarters Military Division of the Missouri, New Orleans, Louisiana, January 5, 1875. Received January 5.]

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti no further action need be taken except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Such a telegram should brand him for all time to come as the Haynau of our Army; as one who stands isolated and alone, "unapproached and unapproachable" in the blood-thirstiness of his nature, and should drive him, as one of old, a fugitive and vagabond from civilized society. The blood of the innocent Indian shed by this man, dressed in a little brief authority, still haunts him, and he, like all other shedders of blood, seeks to "wash it out" by other murders; but it will cling to him as his Nemesis with unwearied step and untiring spirit.

On the 6th of January, 1875, Secretary Belknap sent the following telegram to General Sheridan at New Orleans:

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

Approved of his course in what? In declaring a whole people banditti. In doing that that Burke said he could not do, draw an indictment against a whole people. In seeking to subject those people to military trials in the very face of the celebrated Milligan case, in which the Supreme Court of the United States declared "that there was no unwritten criminal code to which resort can be had as a source of jurisdiction in times of peace." Although a great outrage was committed by the President and all concerned upon the sovereignty of a State in invading its legislative halls by an armed force and expelling its members at the point of the bayonet under the direction of Kellogg, De Trobriand, and Sheridan, and one that would in such States as New York or Pennsylvania provoke bloodshed, yet, be it spoken in all honor to those people, to those law-abiding, patriotic democrats, they submitted with heroic courage to the oppressions, and so acted as to foil the President in his revolutionary scheme, and by thus acting have elicited the applause of mankind and mortally wounded the whole carpet-bag system of governments. An English writer of great ability says of the President's usurpation in Louisiana:

Three months earlier President Grant might have urged with some plausibility that he was only following what had once been the popular republican policy, and that he did not know that the feeling of the party had changed. But after the greatest party reverse that has been witnessed for many years in the United States, this plea is too absurd to be even suggested. The President must have foreseen the unpopularity he was creating for himself and his party, and must have had some motive for incurring a danger which lay so immediately before his eyes. What, then, could this motive have been? The only possible answer to the question seems to be this: President Grant sees that the maintenance of the carpet-bag governments in the Southern States is indispensible to the recovery of the republican party, and that the only means by which these governments can be kept in being is by creating a state of things which shall unmistakably call for the interference of the Federal Government. If the Southern conservatives can but be committed to open resistance to the United States troops, this requirement would be abundantly fulfilled.

If the democratic members, instead of submitting under protest to General De Trobriand's orders, had snatched up their revolvers and fired upon the soldiers under his command, civil war would have broken out that day in New Orleans, and the white population in Louisiana would have been exhibited in overt rebellion against the Government of the United States. When once things had come to this point the indignation of the Northern States would have been roused, and the democrats would have been loaded with the odium which would have attached to a revival of the old secession temper. The self-control of the Louisiana conservatives has frustrated this design, but it is exceedingly difficult to resist the belief that it was really entertained. We are well aware how grave a charge this is to bring against President Grant. To aim at provoking civil strife in order to secure a party advantage is as great a crime as a public man can well commit. If there were any other way of accounting for President Grant's attitude in this matter we should not suggest this one. But we have seen how inadmissible the alternative explanations are; and in this way the choice has come to lie between taking this last explanation or none at all. President Grant does not seem the sort of man who would act in a matterof this gravity without any conscious motive; and with all the care we can give to the consideration of what his motive is likely to have been, no other seems to present itself which is not demonstrably impossible.

I wish that I could acquit the President of the charge of having confederated with that most notable usurper, Kellogg, to overthrow the liberties of the State of Louisiana. His services have been great to the country, have made our Army renowned in history and song, and I would not willingly, even if able to do so, place the slightest cloud on his fame. But, sirs, it is my profound belief that he has violated the Constitution in acting as he has done toward that State, and I would not be doing my duty to say less. And to tide you over those blunders, and to break the force of the report of the first committee sent there by this House, you have sent a second one to produce a report, if possible, different from the first. That report has been made, and in the language of one of the Administration organs in this city it will suit the party. Your whole Louisiana intermeddling has been wrong and has been sickening to the whole North.

Speaking of the usurping governor of Louisiana, the Philadelphia Inquirer, a strong republican paper, says:

"William Pitt Kellogg, governor of Louisiana by virtue of the midnight order of a drunken judge who resigned from the bench to save himself the disgrace of being impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, is getting tired of office. Its cares and responsibilities sit heavily upon him, and he now announces his perfect willingness to settle the respective gubernatorial claims of himself and McEnery by a friendly and dispassionate game of poker or seven-up. Why not? He showed no more honesty in his way of getting into the office than the professional gambler shows in getting into the pockets of his victim; and why should he hesitate to get out of it like a gambler?"

Having failed to provoke civil strife in Louisiana, and standing to-day condemned by all persons freed of subservient partisanship, and having exhibited to all by the failure the purpose for which that State was invaded by his booted warrior, he, not abashed, has turned "his policy" upon Arkansas. In that State an election was had for governor in 1872 between Elisha Baxter and Joseph Brooks. The former was supported by all the carpet-bag, scalawag, and negro elements, and the latter by the honest republicans and democrats. CLAYTON, DORSEY & Co. believing that they could manipulate Baxter as they desired, had him declared governor, although Brooks had received the majority of the votes. That power is the peculiar outgrowth and production of those graceless scamps all over the South called "loyalists." Brooks appealed to the President and to arms for his rights, and was soon declared an outlaw, a "turbulent fellow," and was ordered to disperse. Baxter was recognized as governor by the President, and his legislature as the legal Legislature. Senator CLAYTON telegraphed from New York to Elisha Baxter on the 3d of June, 1873, that he (Baxter) was the legitimate governor of Arkansas, and that he must stand firm regardless of results. Senator DORSEY on the same day and from the same city telegraphed to Governor Elisha Baxter:

You have the unqualified support of myself and friends. The revolutionary proceedings instituted will not be sustained by the people.

Baxter discharged the duties of the office with marked honesty and ability until Governor Garland was elected under the provisions of the new constitution. And now, Mr. Speaker, the President, with a wonderful forgetfulness of the past, seems determined to do in Arkansas what he failed to do in Louisiana—provoke, if possible, a revolution in a State that had become peaceable and prosperous. I call your attention to his words, full of dictation and partisanship:

To the Senate of the United States:

Herewith I have the honor to send, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, all the information in my possession not heretofore furnished relative to affairs in the State of Arkansas. I will venture to express the opinion that all the testimony shows that in the election of 1872 Joseph Brooks was lawfully elected governor of that State; that he has been unlawfully deprived of the possession of his office since that time; that in 1874 the constitution of the State was by violence, intimidation, and revolutionary proceedings overthrown, and a new constitution adopted and a new State government established. These proceedings, if permitted to stand, practically ignore all the rights of minorities in all the States. Also, what is there to prevent each of the States recently readmitted to Federal relations, on certain conditions, from changing their constitutions and violating their pledges, if this action in Arkansas is acquiesced in? I respectfully submit whether a precedent so dangerous to the stability of State government, if not of the National Government also, should be recognized by Congress. I earnestly ask that Congress will take definite action in the matter to relieve the Executive from acting upon questions which should be decided by the legislative branch of the Government.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1875.

What has been done in that State that establishes "a precedent so dangerous to State governments?" The Legislature met by which the convention was called with his full knowledge and approbation, and the changes that took place in that State transpired under his immediate eye. Again listen to the evidence I produce against the President:

On the 22d of April, 1874, Baxter telegraphed to the President as follows: "I propose to call the Legislature together at an early day, and leave them to settle the question, as they alone have the power; but to do this the members of the Legislature must have assurances of protection from you and a guarantee that they may meet in safety. This will be a peaceable solution of the difficulty, and I will readily abide by the decision of the Legislature." On the same day the President replied to Baxter as follows: "I heartily approve any adjustment peaceably of the pending difficulties in Arkansas by means of the Legislative Assembly, the courts, or otherwise. I will give all the assistance and protection I can under the Constitution and laws of the United States to such modes of adjustment. I hope that the military on both sides will now be disbanded." On the 24th of April Baxter replied as follows: "In accordance with my correspondence with you by telegraph, I have convened the Legislature for the 11th May. I have sent home part of my forces and would willingly send the balance, except a small body-guard, but Brooks retains his whole force and receives re-enforcements. All the people desire is that peace be restored, and the Legislature protected in the performance of their legitimate business."

The convention called by that Legislature met as was required by the voice of the people, and put forth a constitution, "and the people ratified it by an overwhelming majority." The President says the constitution of 1868 "was by violence, intimidation, and revolutionary proceedings overthrown and a new constitution adopted and a new State government established." Is that so? Is the offense in the manner in which the old constitution was displaced, or in the selection of democratic officials to fill the offices? If the former, I here in my place pronounce it legal and challenge refutation; if the latter, I refer you to the report of the committee of this House, of which the venerable Mr. POLAND, of Vermont, is chairman.

The committee are satisfied that the convention to frame the constitution and the constitution itself were voted for and are satisfactory to the majority of the voters and people of the State. The State officers were certainly elected by a majority of the votes cast, and we think by a majority of the votes in the State. The condition of the State has been as peaceful since the new government was inaugurated as it ever has been. Acts of violence have been very few indeed.

This is the clear and emphatic language of that committee appointed to report upon the affairs in Arkansas. Now, sir, as to the manner in which the new constitution was made to supplant the old constitution. I have no hesitancy in declaring it legal. Although there were some technical informalities in the mode of its adoption, those informalities cannot "invalidate the instrument thus adopted." The committee say:

We are asked to recommend, that the National Government shall declare in some form that the new constitution has not suspended that of 1868, but that the old is still the true fundamental law of the State, and that Mr. Brooks, who doubtless was elected and ought to have been declared governor, is now the lawful governor of the State, and that the Government will support and uphold him as the lawful governor of the State. * * * The people of every State have a right to make their own constitution to suit themselves, provided it be republican in form and in harmony with the Constitution of the United States; and the National Government has not the authority to deprive them of that right. Here we have the case of a State having a constitution republican in form, adopted and ratified by a large majority of its people, manned by officers of their choice, and going forward with reasonable quiet and peace. Your committee cannot find any solid ground on which to stand to say the General Government can or ought to interfere; and no amount of irregularity in the processes by which this state of things was brought about furnishes just reason for doing so. The committee believe, upon principles now well established, all these defects and irregularities in the proceedings must be regarded as cured by the verdict of the people.

Admitting that Joseph Brooks was lawfully elected governor of the State of Arkansas, and that he has been "unlawfully deprived of the possession of the office," who did it? Strange to say, the President; the very man who in eight months after he did it undertakes to restore him, although since the election and since his removal the old constitution of 1868, under which he claimed his election, has ceased to exist, and another and different man than his opponent occupies the office under and by virtue of a new constitution invoked into existence by that normal and inherent power ever existing in the people, above the forms and ceremonies of the law, so well expressed in words in the Declaration of Independence:

Whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends [of government] it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. * * * We hold these truths to be self-evident.

Comparisons being in themselves odious, frequently make odious inconsistencies in men, and more especially those inconsistencies in our officials when caused by a guilty ambition. Now let us place side by side the President's letter to the Senate on the 8th of February, 1875, and his proclamation of warning to Joseph Brooks dated 15th May, 1874, and see how well they harmonize. It must be remembered they are about the same persons, the same State, and the same election.

IN MAY.

By the President of the United States of America—A Proclamation: Whereas certain turbulent and disorderly persons, pretending that Elisha Baxter, the present executive of Arkansas, was not elected, have combined together with force and arms to resist his authority as such executive, and other authorities of said State; and whereas said Elisha Baxter has been duly declared elected by the General Assembly of said State, as provided in the constitution thereof, and has for a long period been exercising the functions of said office, into which he was inducted according to the constitution and laws of said State, and ought by its citizens to be considered the lawful executive thereof; and whereas the said Elisha Baxter under section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has heretofore made application to me to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence: Now, therefore,

I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation and command all turbulent and disorderly persons to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within ten days from this date, and hereafter submit themselves to the lawful authority of the said executive and other constituted authorities of said State; and I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens to uphold law and preserve the public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 15th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1874, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-fifth.

U. S. GRANT.

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
February 8, 1875.

I ask you gentlemen upon the other side of this House why is the President pursuing such a course toward Arkansas? It is not because that State has not a republican form of government, because the committee say the present constitution is preferable to that of 1868; it is not because that convention by which the constitution of 1874 was formed was not called into a legal existence, as nearly every State in the Union has at one time or another changed its constitution as Arkansas has done. Georgia did so twice in the year 1789 and again in 1838. South Carolina did so in 1790; New Hampshire in 1791; New York in 1801, 1821, and in 1846; Connecticut in 1818; Massachusetts in 1820 and 1853; Rhode Island in 1824, 1834, 1841, and 1842; Virginia in 1829, 1850, and 1864; North Carolina in 1835; Pennsylvania in 1837; New Jersey in 1844; Missouri in 1845, 1861, and 1865; and Indiana in 1850. It is because the President "aims at provoking civil strife in order to secure a party advantage," and in the midst of that strife to secure a third nomination for the Presidency.

I have enumerated Arkansas and Louisiana as the States in which he seeks to provoke this strife. It will not end there when commenced, but will be incited all over the South, and what little liberty, what native honesty, what little independence is found there will be crushed out under the upper and nether millstone of the President's wrath; and he will stretch over that fair region "the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab." What will all of this be but an acknowledged and conceded failure before all of the governments of the world, before mankind trembling for liberty, of the reconstruction of the Southern States, after ten long weary years of effort. And what is it but the failure of the republican party to give peace, prosperity, and contentment to the whole country after fifteen years' possession of nearly all the States; fifteen years' possession of the Government, with all of its departments, its courts, its Army, its Navy, and its billions of money?

The condition of the South is known to all, and all pity her but the heavy "mailed hand" resting upon her. It seems, sir, that if the course pursued toward that bowed country is continued much longer, it will be in the sad condition of Ireland, when Lord Gray, its governor, wrote to the Queen of England "that Her Majesty would soon reign over only ashes and dead bodies."

We see that the policy pursued by the President has failed, shamelessly failed, to give peace, to create and establish commerce, to revive agricultural and manufacturing life in the Southern States. Now let us turn to the Northern States and ascertain what effect it has had upon them. It is an admitted fact that these States, upon the close of the war, were stronger and richer than ever before. The very causes that produced poverty in the South were those that added wealth, unanimity, and wonderful force to the North. As long as the war lasted, and the excitement growing out of that war existed, all the States lying north of Mason and Dixon's line accumulated immense wealth and an unusual increase of population from immigration and other sources. Those fomenting the strife and excitement, after peace had been declared, were either greatly ignorant of the teachings of history or wantonly wicked in not applying those lessons to the case in hand.

There is a point beyond which, in the commercial, political, and physical natures of all people, you cannot go, without affecting the internal organisms of each. Trade has its natural, arbitrary laws, which permit no disturbance of long duration without exacting a penalty. If those laws are violated under any state of circumstances, troubles, panics, paroxysms will as inevitably follow as disease does in the track of dissipation or any abnormal disturbance of our physical natures. The prosperity of the North during and immediately following the war was a natural incident of that war, as the demands of the Government at that time caused it to scatter with a lavish hand billions of money among that people. This money was not expended to create wealth, but to conquer and desolate one-half of our own country, and then, as future events have demonstrated, to hold that half for political purposes only, in which political storms were to be engendered by those "vipers that creep where man disdains to climb," just preceding elections, for party ends, for party measures.

Onward and onward with the wild dance has been the cry of the republican leaders, until it has brought the whole country to the brink of bankruptcy and ruin. Distress, pinching, persecuting distress, is felt all over our land, making the strong father and resolute mother bow in anguish over a hungry family of children, and amid all this the solemn voice of Mr. DAWES, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, is heard in this House calling for more money, more taxation, as if it were a new appeal to the people and they could respond as in other days. Only forty millions more he says; that is not much; only a dollar per capita. But this is not all by any means—only a fraction of the demand. In 1858 the expenditures of the Government reached their maximum before the war, when the net ordinary expenses amounted to $72,000,000 in round numbers. In 1874, nine years after the war closed, these same expenditures amount to $194,000,000! The following table will show how the items of these two years compare:

	1858.	1874.
War expenses	$25, 679, 121	$42, 313, 927
Navy expenses	14, 053, 264	30, 932, 587
Indian expenses	4, 978, 266	6, 692, 402
Pensions	1, 219, 768	29, 038, 414
Miscellaneous	26, 400, 016	85, 141, 593
Total	72, 330, 435	194, 118, 985

The net ordinary expenses of the Government from 1869 to 1874 were in round numbers—

1869	$190, 000, 000
1870	164, 000, 000
1871	157, 000, 000
1872	153, 000, 000

Thus far there seems to have been a reasonable determination to curtail expenses, but the economy was short-lived, for in the next year, instead of decreasing still further as it should have done, the amount spent was—

1873	$180, 000, 000
1874	194, 000, 000

In the language of Mr. WOOD, of New York, comment upon these figures is unnecessary. They tell their own story, and that is not complimentary to the Administration nor satisfactory to the people. To those vast sums of yearly expenditures by the Government must be added $100,000,000 interest upon our public debt, aggregating in demand for this fiscal year $334,000,000 in times of peace. Surely comment is unnecessary. Great Britain with an interest-bearing debt of $3,872,000,000, more than double that of the interest-bearing debt of the United States; with an army and navy immensely superior to ours in size and appointments; with a costly royalty; with an empire upon which the sun never sets; with a vast outlay of money in her commercial strife with Russia, $25,000,000 of expended capital, and over $350,000,000 of guaranteed capital in internal improvements in British India; with a tonnage four times greater than ours, only expends about $40,000,000 more than our Government, and every dollar of her expenditures realizes in some way peace, happiness, and contentment to her people. How is it in this country now? Mr. RANDALL, one of the clearest thinkers of this House, a distinguished member from Pennsylvania, on this floor a few days ago, in speaking of the mismanagement of the Government by the dominant party, said:

I have stood here resisting any change in the established rules of this House in the particular in which it is now attempted to change them. And why? Because, in the first place, it was designed to open the door of the Treasury to the scheme of every private corporation and individual who sought to apply it. Secondly, because it was for the purpose of letting in legislation to oppress the people of the South. It was to put the iron heel of your expiring power upon the head and body of this people. Moreover, in doing it you have brought distress and want upon my own people. See how it works. You are interfering with the industries of the North, because you deprive them of their best customers for their manufactures. Since the war we have been deprived of our best customers. To-day the only natural, the only willing purchasers of goods manufactured in the North are the southern people, and so long as this crusade is made against the South, so long will they be unable to be the customers of northern industry, and that long you take from the people of the North the bread they might otherwise have eaten and the raiment they might otherwise have worn.

All along through this discussion I have told you, as one member on this floor, that we on this side of the House stood ready to go on with the legitimate business of the country. Instead of this legislation which you propose, prompted by the meanest passions and aimed to crush out a race, we have told you to come to your legitimate duties of legislation; pass your appropriation bills, reducing the amount as far as possible; revive the industry of the country; let us once again be a happy and a prosperous people throughout the length and breadth of this land, whether in the North or in the South. When, in the name of Heaven, is this crusade against the South to end? When will you get over your mean purposes against this people? They surrendered their arms as brave men at Appomattox Court House, and if the policy of General Sherman had run through your legislation from that time to this hour we should have had a people reposing in tranquillity and peace, the terror of all other nations.

Some one may say that is the language of a democrat who has labored for fourteen years in this House to break down the republican party; therefore he cannot be trusted. I admit that he is a democrat of the strictest school, and he is a man of great comprehension and unquestioned honor. If Mr. RANDALL is objected to upon that ground, then let us see what Mr. KELLEY of the same State has to say upon the same subject. He is a republican of undoubted fealty, and a leader of his party:

The falling off in the revenues demonstrates the poverty of the people. They do not contribute to the Treasury, because they cannot supply their wants. They are unable to consume dutiable and taxable commodities, because we have by our legislation paralyzed their productive power. It is a maxim of mine, and I cannot too often repeat it, that a prosperous people not only supply their wants but gratify their desires; while a people suffering as the laboring people of this country now are not only do not gratify their desires, but are unable to provide themselves with the necessaries of life.

More than a million working people of the country are in want. In one week, ay, in the first five days of one week, it is recorded that forty-one sober, industrious, and honest workingmen in my own city begged the privilege of passing the winter in the house of correction rather than starve or steal.

This speech was made on the 13th of this month in this House on the new revenue bill. In the same speech he said:

But we are asked to close our eyes upon this suffering and maintain the honor of the country by imposing taxes enough to enable the Treasury to purchase more than $31,000,000 of bonds. When the sufferings of our people are alluded to, it is asked, Was ever any nation able to put its bonds at a premium so speedily as we have done? That is no answer to me, and it is no answer to the men who, having accumulated by long years of toil and economy a little homestead embarrassed by a small mortgage, have seen it pass under the sheriff's hammer at a nominal price to the mortgagee. It is no answer to the worthy people who have lived under a noble sense of independence, in view of their ability to maintain themselves and their families by labor, and who now find themselves forced to endure the torture of living on the bitter bread of charity.

Sir, I am as anxious as any gentleman on this floor to sustain the credit of the country. I have desired to see it gradually appreciated; but when I see our finances so managed as to feed the gold and bullion brokers on the blood of my constituents, I feel constrained to beg my friends to order a halt, and if possible to retrace some of their mistaken steps. My colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] says that the public debt has been reduced $600,000,000. Sir, I know that these figures represent the reduction as it appears in the books of the Treasury and in the debt statement. But, sir, in its effects upon the industries of the country the debt has not been reduced. No, sir; measured thus it has been more than doubled. Let me demonstrate this.

What is the burden of a debt on a great country like this, to which four hundred thousand people would gladly come every year and identify themselves with its fortunes and share the burdens of its debt if our unwise legislation was not repelling them? It is not the ultimate extinguishment of the principal. It is the draught it makes upon the current resources, the annual earnings of the people. Let us measure our debt by what it required to pay the interest when we owed the $600,000,000 which we have extinguished and what it now requires. Everybody that could work was then employed; now more than a million workers are idle. Yet in day's labor we now pay more than two for every one the interest on the total debt required. We pay more than two pounds of tobacco for one, more than two pounds of cotton for one, two bushels of wheat, two barrels of flour for one, and infinitely more than two gallons of petroleum, and so on with all the great staples of the country we are able to export. And this is all due to the processes we have resorted to for enhancing the value of our bonds in foreign markets. We have thus doubled the burdens of the people while reducing the total of the debt. We have thus made the property of the rich man more valuable, while we have robbed millions of laborers of their whole estate. The wages of the current day they waste in enforced idleness.

Does that language, used by a gentleman so well informed and so skillful in debate in the defense of his party, describe a prosperous and happy people? Weigh it, ponder over it, workingmen; and then tell me, you who still vote the republican ticket, what you think of the management of a country, by a party claiming to be successful, when "more than a million of your own class, your own brothers," are in want; when in one week, ay, in the first five days of one week, it is recorded, says Judge KELLEY, that "forty-one sober, industrious, and honest workingmen in the city of Philadelphia begged the privilege of passing the winter in the house of correction, rather than starve or steal." If such results are the evidences of statesmanship, then I say the sooner the country is delivered from it the better, else the idle men, made so by compulsion, who are the majority in every hamlet and city in this country, will form from necessity, from the piteous appeals of wives and children for bread, the most dangerous societies within our land.

The Carbonari of Italy and Spain was formed to resist such oppressions as now disturb our laboring classes. Their motto was to wreak revenge on the wolves who destroy our lambs. Such societies naturally grow during such times as these. The administration that produces such times is responsible for their existence. The republican party met its first and general defeat last fall by those people made idle by its legislation, and others of a more important nature will follow in the coming years. The cry of disloyalty, the shout of "rebel," the swinging aloft of the bloody shirt, may please the well-fed crowd; but they cease to influence the hungry laborer who understands the object. Curran said in the British Parliament that an oppressed and hungry people will in some way strike down their oppressors, even with their own shackles. They have commenced the work in this country by the quiet ballot. In the language of the accomplished WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS, of New Jersey—

One hundred of them have been shaken out of this Capitol, and I say their places have been supplied with better men.

There must be some prominent cause for this prevalent want in the North as well as the South—this great revulsion in the political sentiment. When the democratic party sought to prolong its existence in office before the war by exclusive party measures, without regard to the peace of the country, it soon aroused a sentiment of opposition so strong that it completed its overthrow. The republican party is pursuing the same course now, and is meeting with the same result all over the country. Partisanship is not yet stronger than patriotism in this land, however much the latter may have been debased by the thousands who have assumed to be the peculiar friends of the Government and country merely to secure individual preferment.

The republican party is not dead by any means; but under its present management it has been led so far away from its old landmarks, so far away from that lofty dignity and love of country with which such men as Greeley, Seward, Lincoln, and Adams imbued it; so far away from the Constitution that has been our pillar of cloud by day and our pillar of fire by night for so many years, that myriads of its old lovers, its old founders, are leaving it with trembling steps and heavy hearts. Such men hang their harps upon the willows, as they sit beside strange streams and listen to the burning words of the New York Tribune, the original organ of the party, now pecked at by jackdaws:

What has the party to remember with pride or satisfaction in all its history which the Tribune does not share? Go through these six years of President Grant's administration with a lighted candle and bring us anything accomplished—anything whatever of which the party can boast—any act or policy or anything else which a judicious friend can set up and go around and look at from all sides without a sense of shame or pity. When the war was over and the sword was laid aside and the nation settled all its differences, with an outstretched hand the Tribune looked into the faces not of enemies but of fellow-citizens, of men of the same race and blood, between whom now all differences had been washed away. It feeds no grudges, harbors no animosities, treasures no unkindly memories. The labors of the crusade, the hardships of the march, and the glories of the field it shared; in the plunder of the camps it has no part. It recognized the logic of events in the period of greed which a condition of war had engendered, and it lost no time in turning its weapons at once upon the corrupting influences and debasing tendencies which were the natural accompaniments of such a time.

If we have denounced the corruptions and condemned the dishonesty of the party in power, it has not been recklessly or with wantonness. If any well-meaning republican has been offended by the freedom of our criticism, and the persistence with which we pursue the abuses of power by men who call themselves republicans, we can only say that it has given us greater pain than he could possibly have felt to find these abuses sheltered under a name of whose memories, traditions, and glories we inherit so large a share. But country is more than party, and truth is above all names. Of what significance is the name of a party which twenty years ago was born out of opposition to the extension of slavery, passed through all the stages of development till it culminated in the establishment of the freedom and citizenship of all men, and then fell into the hands of men who brought neither intelligence nor patriotism to the task of organization, and only contributed audacity and cunning to the wrangle for the spoils? All that remains of the party is the name. In common with thousands of sincere patriots all over the country, we should rejoice to see that rescued from the men under whose bad leadership it has been discredited and disgraced. But there seems to be a lack of the muscle and fiber, the courage and manliness, to make the attempt.

Without harmony or coherence upon any single question, agreeing in nothing except subserviency to a President whose will is absolute and whom it is bewilderment to follow, the party leaders propose now one supreme effort to retain power by a crime against the Constitution and the peace of the country. The gravity of the crisis cannot be overestimated.

Why is it, sir, that such great papers as the Tribune have been discarded? Why is it that its great leader and editor in his life-time was so pursued and villified by the Administration now in power? Because he said peace to the South and halt to his party when the war closed. Because he held up the Constitution of our country to his party, and said, suffer that not to perish! Rather surrender the Capitol, with all of its prestige and glory, to the democratic party. This was "the very head and front of his offending." It was a lofty patriotism, such as will do to imitate.

Sir, in the days when Themistocles led the Athenians to victory at Salamis, he advised them to surrender their capital for the preservation of the constitution of their country. That gallant people rose under the impulse of patriotism as one man, and with a stern resolution to yield life itself rather than abandon their liberties and surrender the proud privilege of legislating for themselves to the delegate of a Persian despot, who offered them "all their own dominions together with an accession of territory ample as their wishes upon the single condition that they should receive law and suffer him to preside in Greece." At that eventful period of their history Crysilus alone proposed the surrender of their constitution to save the capital, and they stoned him to death. And the Athenian matrons in their indignation then rose and inflicted the same punishment on his wife. Loving their capitol and their noble city, rich as it was with the production of every art and glittering all over with the proudest trophies and the most splendid temples in the world, deserting in the cause of free government the very land that gave them birth, they embarked on board their ships and fought that battle the name of which has made the bosom of freemen to thrill with sympathy in all the ages that have followed it, and shall cause the patriot's heart to beat higher with emotion through countless ages to come. Have we such patriots in the republican party now? Are there any now in that party as its leaders who would be willing to give up the capital with its power, its wealth, its Departments "glittering all over with the proudest trophies of its victories," for the preservation of the Constitution of their country? I am inclined to think not. In such an emergency I think it would be said by many now in power, in the language of one of their old leaders, "The Constitution is a league with the devil and a covenant with death"—let it slide.

It is an unfortunate day for any country when men secure high places who prefer power to the constitution, and seek the elevation of the political body to which they adhere at the hazard of the constitution. It is not the best men of a party who do this—only the adventurers and time-servers within its ranks. But it sometimes is the case with all parties, as with the republican party now, that their good men are silenced by the audacity of the bad men, who in the midst of appalling times—to men of heart, soul, and brain—"howl strange songs and reel in strange dances amid the turbulence and carnage." Sir, whenever a dominant party like the republican party, so full of men of great ability and great undertakings, permits its fledglings and "carrion-crow" men, fresh from the extremes of the other party, double-dyed traitors of easy consciences, and facile morals, to rule in its deliberations and dictate its policy, to openly asperse its founders—men who lived in thought and deed in an atmosphere too pure for such creatures, then, sir, that party has passed from its "first estate," and will soon be numbered among the things in the past, "a school-boy's tale, the wonder of an hour." We witness that sight often on the other side of this House. The ranks of the republican party, North and South, are filled by men whose denunciations of the Union and its flag, of Lincoln, and his administration, are still reverberating over the hills and valleys of the seceding States, who from some cause unknown and undesired by good men—

Rode the storm when the seas were rough,
Yet in some sunny hour fell off.

And, sir, these men are the very ones in God's providence who are destroying that party. Macaulay says "the vilest spy and sycophant is he who serves his conqueror against the interest of his native land." Violence and more violence, blood and more blood, make up their whole policy. The party, backed and ridered by the carpet-baggers, scalawags, and traitors, the Hessians of our politics, has succeeded in bringing about a demoralization in the South of which none of us may see the close; and having brought it about, they marvel at it, bewail it, execrate it as the work of rebels; they ascribe it to everything but the real cause—their own bad legislation, their own immorality, and their own profound incapacity for the conduct of great affairs. There can be no partial or censorious legislation by Congress in a country like this without evil effects upon the whole. Every part of the country is too intimately blended together by streams, railroads, seas, and gulfs not to feel in its trade, its commerce, from center to circumference, every manifestation of partisanship toward any of its parts. The republican party has disregarded this relationship for the last fifteen years in its determination to rule the country; and now look at the result in the simple value of real and personal estate in 1870 compared with 1860. Their value in—

States.	1870.	1860.
Alabama	$255,855,841	$495,237,078
Arkansas	156,394,691	219,256,473
Florida	41,163,655	73,101,500

Maryland	348,155,671	376,919,944
Total	3,683,163,260	6,245,129,108

These reliable figures show a shrinkage in ten years of nearly 50 per cent., and it has been since 1870 up to 1875 25 per cent. more, making a loss to those States, to the whole country, of quite $4,000,000,000—$1,000,000,000 more than the debt of Great Britain and $2,000,000,000 more than our own national debt. Is that not giving the peace of death to this country rapidly? Is that not one of the marked reasons why one million laborers in the North are begging for bread, and Mr. DAWES, as the mouth-piece of the Secretary of the Treasury, is appealing to Congress for greater revenues? These figures also show the remarkable fact that whenever one or more of the above-named States has been continuously under democratic rule, the decrease in values has been slight compared with one or more of those that have been under republican rule. Take for example Kentucky and South Carolina:

States.	1870.	1860.
Kentucky	$604,318,552	$666,043,112
South Carolina	208,146,989	548,138,754

The decrease has been only about 10 per cent. in Kentucky, and nearly 200 per cent. in South Carolina. So with the other States does the comparison obtain under similar circumstances. Now let us view in another light the ruinous effects of republicanism in the management of the Southern States. We have seen the astounding decrease in the valuation of the real and personal estates in those Southern States from 1860 to 1870. Now permit me to show you and the country at large the increase in taxation and of the public debt in those same States between the same periods of time; and it seems to me that did you men of the North live under the same misrule, that your very children would rise in indignation and exclaim—

If you have nature in you, hear it not.

It will thus be seen that while the assessed value of the taxable property in the eleven southern States has been decreased 75 per cent. since 1860, taxation for State purposes only, as above given, shows a fearful increase, equivalent in many cases, in the language of Senator SHERMAN, to confiscation. The county taxation in 1860 in those States on all the property they then owned was only $3,115,184, while now under carpet-bag and negro rule it is over $15,000,000, nearly $12,000,000 more on the remnant still in existence than on the whole property owned when the war began. In the language of another I say:

In view of the enormous debt which we have shown has been wantonly, corruptly, and fraudulently heaped upon a people as poor as the census reports, taken by United States officials, show the people of the South to be, with five-eighths of their property gone and the taxation on the remnant nearly fourfold as much as it was on the whole when the affairs were honestly managed, is it to be expected that the people of these States will have either love or respect for the men or the party by whom they have been thus plundered?

Republican officials and Congressmen, as well as the press and politicians of that party, have tried to impress upon the country how magnanimous they have been to the people of the South, how mercifully they have treated them, and point with triumph to the fact that no men were executed for any of the acts of war. We think no man can look over the testimony taken before this committee without coming to the conclusion that no people had ever been so mercilessly robbed and plundered, so wantonly and causelessly humiliated and degraded, so recklessly exposed to the rapacity and lust of the ignorant and vicious portion of their own community and of the other States, as the people of the South have been for the last six years.

History, till now, gives no account of a conqueror so cruel as to place his vanquished foes under the dominion of their former slaves. That was reserved for the radical rulers in this great Republic.

Such derangement in State governments cannot exist without having its effect upon the productive capacities of such States. Consider them now with reference only to one staple production, cotton. The following shows the relative productive capacities of the cotton States in 1860 and 1870:

States.	1870.	1860.
	Bales.	Bales.
Alabama	429,482	989,955
Arkansas	247,968	367,393
Florida	39,789	65,153
Georgia	473,734	701,840
Louisiana	350,832	777,738

North Carolina	144,935	145,514
South Carolina	224,500	353,412
Tennessee	181,842	296,464
Texas	350,628	431,463
Virginia	183	12,727
Aggregate	3,009,031	5,344,170

This shows a decrease of 2,335,139 bales; about the same proportion of decrease as the value of real and personal estate in the same States between the same years. This decrease must continue under the demoralized system of labor now existing in those States. Nothing is raised in those States to supply this deficiency in material wealth; and what is the effect of it upon the country? The millions of money sent South after the war from the North has been dissipated, thousands upon thousands of men have been pecuniarily ruined, railroads have failed to meet their indebtedness, steamboats and shipping of all kinds have become dead capital, cities have become desolate, and the hungry laborers maddened into desperation. Commerce sits as a widowed mother over the graves of her children, mourning as Rachel did of old, and will not be comforted because of the loss, and over all that fair region that once teemed with a fruitful industry there now hangs the wrath of a political power unsanctioned by justice and unrestrained by patriotism. Do you republican Representatives of the agricultural States of the West and of the manufacturing interests of the North believe that such an anarchy can exist in one-half of our own country by your own acts and those of your President with his brothers-in-law and Gatling guns without affecting your own districts of the country? If you do, you study history to little advantage and are slow indeed in understanding the causes of the stagnation all over your once thrifty section.

Says Macaulay:

Nothing is more ridiculous than the manner in which writers and historians, like Carnot, defend or excuse the Jacobin administration in France, while they declaim against the reaction which followed. That this has produced and is still producing much evil is perfectly true. But what produced the reaction? The spring flies up with a force proportioned to that with which it has been pressed down. The pendulum which is drawn far in one direction swings as far in the other. The joyous madness of intoxication in the evening is followed by languor on the morrow. And so in politics it is the sure law that every excess shall generate its opposite; nor does he deserve the name of a statesman who strikes a great blow without calculating the effect of the rebound. But such calculation was infinitely beyond the reach of the authors of the Reign of Terror.

They in their madness, like you gentlemen belonging to the majority in this Congress, rushed on from one wild scheme of legislation to another, tampering with sacred personal rights as with toys; striking down State after State and patriot after patriot; discarding prophet and priest and thrusting in their stead, as the religion of France, the Goddess of Reason; tearing from their cemeteries, their tombstones, the beautiful inscriptions of immortality and rearing over their entrances their lesson of progress, that "Death was an eternal sleep," until at last that violence produced a reaction, and that reaction redeemed and regenerated France into an empire of power.

To show you that the evil consequences of a badly managed government have reached the Western and Northern States, let me call your attention to the failures in business in 1874. I embrace all the States and Territories. It is a conceded fact that all the Southern States which have been under republican rule since 1865 are irredeemably bankrupt, and the cases given of individual failures only show how such maladministrations are reaching the various branches of business.

Is this enumeration all? I ask you men from the North, from the New England States, from the broad prairies of the West, in what condition are the industries in your States? But one voice is heard in response, and that is in the language of Judge KELLEY, of Pennsylvania: "More than a million working people of the country are in want!" Why is it? Who is to blame for it? The republican party. Look at the condition in which it has placed some of the States which it has ruled since 1865:

The aggregate of State debts in the Union in 1874 was $382,970,517, being an increase of $38,200,000 since 1870. Of this amount $164,732,000 is in default—the defaulting States being Alabama, on $21,350,000; Arkansas, on $12,800,000; Florida, on $3,774,000; Georgia, on $11,000,000; Louisiana, on $24,433,000; Minnesota, on $2,275,000; Mississippi, on $7,000,000; North Carolina, on $24,900,000; South Carolina, on $13,200,000, and Virginia, on $46,000,000. Of the total State debts $92,924,000 is estimated to be held abroad, and of the amount in default $54,174,000 is held abroad. The debts in default bear an average interest of about 7 per cent. Some of the defaulting States, Georgia and Minnesota, have disowned the debts; others, like Mississippi, Louisiana, and South Carolina, have repudiated them; and others, like North Carolina and Virginia, declare their inability to pay—Virginia, because the new State of West Virginia refuses to assume its just share of the indebtedness. Of the whole amount ($164,732,000) it is probable three-fourths will never be paid.

Why are your factories closed, your wharves barren, your warehouses empty, your business men idle, your railroads delinquent and at war with each other, your furnaces as silent as the grave, your fishermen with folded arms, your factory girls driven to absolute want and ruination, your streets silent or sounding only to the heavy step of desperate laborers, your immigration stopped, and your churches only filled by the favored few who seek salvation through their money? I say, why is all this? It is because you legislate for a party and not for the country; and, in the language of Judge KELLEY, by thus legislating, "have made the property of the rich man more valuable, while we have robbed millions of laborers of their whole estate." Sirs, you can no more make a part of a country connected together like ours prosper while you subject the other part to a vassalage worse than that of Ireland, than you can have a healthy head and heart while the limbs are gangrened by some foul disease. These States must stand or fall together. If one or more is made the victim of unauthorized power, its fall will affect the whole system, and the precedent will but encourage future encroachments. When Louisiana falls, New Hampshire is not safe. If Arkansas writhes in the fold, then Connecticut may next feel the pain.

The republican party, with the President at its head, is legislating for an increased centralization of power, and against the democratic party, the great representative of the people, the poor as well as the rich; using the bayonet and the sword to accomplish the defects of legislation—fit instruments in the hands of a reckless tool to quiet conscience and override the Constitution. They have collected from the people in the same length of time more money than was ever taken from any people under the sun by their own government. Bismarck made France pay $1,000,000,000 for being conquered by Germany, and this party now in control of the Government has made our people pay in the last ten years very nearly four times as much, and yet it is said that the republican party has given happiness to the people and placed light burdens upon their shoulders. Mr. HEREFORD, of West Virginia, said with great force a few days ago:

From the foundation of this Government, March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1866, there was received into the Treasury of the United States $3,049,034,567.15. During the eight years commencing July 1, 1866, and ending July 1, 1874, there was received into the Treasury $3,473,622,887.55, making about $400,000,000 more received into the Treasury within these eight years than was received from the foundation of the Government down to July 1, 1866. In view of these figures, I ask this Congress whether it is not high time that we should engage in the work of retrenchment and reform and cutting down our expenses.

Furthermore, the same report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that on the 1st of July, 1866, the debt of the United States was $2,773,236,173.69. Thus we received into the Treasury of the United States during those eight years the enormous sum of $700,000,000 more than the whole debt of the United States. Yet gentlemen tell us that we must still impose additional taxes upon the people of the United States!

It is further shown by the last report of the Bureau of Statistics that our exports for last year were more than they have been in any year since the foundation of the Government. Yet we are told that we need more money; that our Treasury is not in as prosperous a condition as it should be.

On page 13 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury submitted to this Congress we find the net ordinary receipts from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1874, were $6,049,034,567.15; and the net ordinary receipts for—

1866	$519,949,564 33
1867	462,846,679 94
1868	376,434,453 82
1869	357,188,256 09
1870	395,959,833 87
1871	374,431,104 94
1872	364,694,229 91
1873	322,177,673 78
1874	299,941,090 84
	3,473,622,887 55

In the same report we find the indebtedness of the United States on June 30, 1866, was $2,773,236,173.69, and the amount received between June 30, 1866, and June 30, 1874, was $3,473,622,887.20, showing that the receipts in those eight years were $700,386,713.51 more than the whole debt of the United States was on June 30, 1866. We also find from the last report of the Bureau of Statistics that our exports from September 30 to June 30 in merchandise (domestic) were $569,433,421, and foreign exports during same period were $16,849,619, making an aggregate for that period of $586,283,040, which is more than our exports ever were before for a like period. And we are also told in the same report that our imports in merchandise during the same period were $567,406,342, leaving a balance of trade in our favor of $18,876,698. I wish my time allowed me to amplify and draw the legitimate conclusions from these figures. During the year 1860 (President Buchanan's administration) our entire expenditures, including war, Navy pensions, and Indians, were only $6,056,754.71; while during the eight years from June 30, 1866, to June 30, 1874, our expenditures, excluding the interest on the public debt and pensions, averaged per year about $250,000,000.

Few men, indeed, stop to think the value of the commerce and of the agricultural productions destroyed by the course pursued by the republican party toward the Southern States since the war. It is placed by some writers of close observation at $100,000,000 per year. This sum pertains to the Southern States exclusively. I consider the sum too small. Upon this basis $1,000,000,000 have been lost to the wealth of this country—one-fourteenth of the whole assessed value of this whole country. If one billion be the sum lost in the South by republican rule in States sparsely settled, torn and wrecked by war, what an immensely larger sum it must be in the populous North, boisterous with the tread of its industrious people, upon whose every hill-side was once heard the music of machinery and in every valley the song of the laborer. Sir, that party has absorbed all the wealth of this country, and that is the reason why it staggers under the depletion. Its party extravagance drives it on to seek out other ways to extort money from the people. It sees power receding from it from Maine to California, and its leaders, made desperate by defeats, are determined to maintain the supremacy of the party in the offices even at the peril of liberty itself. The evils performed by those in office are of such a grave character that the record of the Departments cannot, will not, be permitted to pass in review before an opposing party.

The money of the people has been used for party purposes; the Army has been withdrawn from the frontier to decide legislative rules and judicial points; the Navy no longer bears our flag as an emblem of power in foreign waters, but is used to train its guns upon our own people, our own cities; our Federal judges, once the pride of our country as men of legal attainments and incorruptible principles, have become efficient instruments of oppression and partisan tools of corruption. Our halls of legislation, that once were the grand arenas of debate and honest legislation, have become the home of the juggler and the hot-bed of partisanship; and their seats, once so elevated that only the pure and the just dared aspire to them, have become objects of public traffic, or the rewards of an active political manager, virtue, dignity, and merit being unconsidered.

The republican party is responsible for all of these evils. When the war closed, had it tendered the olive branch of peace and justice to the South, had it pursued the line of policy marked out or foreshadowed by Mr. Lincoln in the reconciliation of those States, had it been moderate in the collection of the public revenues and economical in their expenditures, had it used the Army to protect our frontiersmen, those bold civilizers of nature, had it used our Navy to guard our commerce on the seas, and illustrate the power and justice of our own flag at home and abroad, had it sent to foreign courts representative men of our country, had it elevated to the bench pure and able men, had it made the Constitution its guide, then, sir, to-day it, from an exhibition of those virtues and from that admiration mankind ever gives to the victor, would be the most potent party with the people that ever had possession of the Government. It has failed in all, and it will pass into history a victim of individualism and of extravagance, a party whose emoluments and offices have become an annuity fund and sinecures for the royal relationship of the President, who revel in wealth, dress in purple and fine linen, while the whole country is staggering like a drunken man under the heaviest burdens that were ever borne by any people.

Before I close permit me to recapitulate some of the sins of omission and commission, some of the unauthorized acts, some of the extravagances of the republican party.

It has overthrown Louisiana by the bayonet, and placed a man in office as governor of that State who was elected, if it all, according to their own statements, by fraud.

It has decided one election, for governor in Arkansas, by the voice of the President, and the same voice is ready to overthrow a constitution, regular in the manner of its making, liberal in its parts, and republican in its form.

It has by its bayonet displaced one sheriff at Vicksburgh and substituted another.

It has by its Army intimidated the large and intelligent white element in the South, and has made that element subordinate to the negro and the plundering carpet-bagger.

It has appointed men United States marshals in those States of pliable consciences and lawless in dispositions, whose only ambitions are to serve their party and accumulate wealth.

It has kept in each of the Southern States an army of deputy United States marshals, men of infamous characters, to vex and annoy those people by illegal and offensive acts.

It has appointed to the judgeships in those States partisans of the most unscrupulous characters, whose ermine has in every instance been blackened by suspicious acts.

It has kept members in this House from some of the districts in those States by its majorities who were discarded by the people, black and white.

It has sent its favorites and tools South with special permits to become enriched from the "widow's mite" and the honest man's toil.

It has arrayed by special legislation and peculiar privileges the colored element against the white, keeping the electors divided on the "color line" for political purposes.

It sends strangers with bitter animosities among the people to collect the revenues.

It has made the custom-houses in the South legislative halls and threatening arsenals.

It has encouraged unscrupulous military officers of the Government to seek by force positions of profit and trust over those people in those States.

It has removed from the South those officers of the Army who have spoken words of peace and kindness to the people.

It has suspended in times of peace the habeas corpus, the great writ of right for the poor and oppressed.

It has enacted harsh and severe laws against those depressed people since the close of the war.

It has attempted by every possible means to enforce social as well as political equality among the races.

It has by Federal legislation and by the use of the Army absorbed and destroyed the reserved rights of the States and centralized the power in the General Government.

It has by ways unknown to the Constitution made those States for all political purposes appendages to the Government, giving them in form only the privileges of States, but denying to them the rights of freemen.

These are some of the evils afflicting the South under republican rule. Now, what are they in the North and what do they cost?

It has thrown one million men out of employment and made them beggars whose labor, if employed, is worth $1.50 per day.

It has closed two-thirds of the factories, founderies, machine-shops, and places of artisan labor in the North, at a loss of millions of dollars per day.

It has destroyed our shipping and commerce by bad legislation during and since the war, until our tonnage ceases to command respectability at home or abroad, thereby losing to our own citizens $100,000,000 per year for the last fourteen years.

It has made the custom-houses of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia hot-beds of political intriguery, efficient means of official robberies, and hiding places for the most corrupt band of villains that ever "cut a throat or scuttled a ship."

It has made the patronage of the Government the "cohesive power" of the Administration.

It has by its varying system of financial legislation made the commercial marts of the North stock-jobbing and gambling places, demoralizing to every branch of trade and corrupting to every pursuit.

It has increased the ordinary expenses of the Government from $60,000,000 in 1860 to $194,000,000 in 1874.

It has encouraged an extravagance in our people beyond their real wealth and resources, and to-day the individual, city, county, State, and Federal indebtedness of our entire country exceeds somewhat $10,000,000,000.

It has reduced our carrying trade on the oceans from 71 per cent. n 1860 to 15 per cent. in 1874, and this reduction was not produced by rebel cruisers; for we had, according to Senator CRAGIN, of New Hampshire, only 443,032 less tonnage in 1865 than we had in 1860.

The loss of this carrying trade to our people is $100,000,000 per annum.

Hon. David Wells, one of our foremost political economists, said that we had lost in values during the war $9,000,000,000. Sir, that is an immense sum, one-half of the value of the assessable property in this whole country according to the last census. Yet I believe that the republican party by its bad legislation in State and Federal Governments, in the shrinkages that it has caused, in the direct and indirect losses that it has produced by such legislation, in the money it has collected and recklessly expended, has cost the people of this country a sum equally as great, and the consequences are now bearing hard upon those people without reference to party lines or political bias.

That party, sir, has prostrated States once of great wealth under the heel of the serf and the robber, has bankrupted one-half of the States of this Union, in fact almost the Government itself; and the financial policy that it has pursued for years has been more in the interest of the foreign bondholder than in defense of the rights of the poor of this land. Sirs, a large number of the intelligent people of this country look upon the President of your party and of the United States with great distrust, and believe that he for partisan purposes has erected in the Southern States a multitude of new offices and sent hither swarms of officers to harass those people and eat out their substance, and has kept among them in times of peace standing armies without the consent of their Legislatures. What have you done by such acts? You have done to that part of our common country what Grattan said the Parliament had done by its injudicious legislation toward the American Colonies: "They have lost her warm heart by practices vile and abominable; they have lost her by their speculative tyranny, by a system of coercion, followed up by a system of blood, and urged so far and continued so long as to leave in the breast of America an eternal alienation." I am done. I wish that our country was in a better condition, with but one hope, one God, one destiny.

Hennepin Canal.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HOLMAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 6, 1875.

The House having under consideration an amendment reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals to the bill (H. R. No. 145) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan and the Illinois, Mississippi, and Rock Rivers—

Mr. HOLMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The remark just submitted to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that in the present state of affairs there will be a deficit in the revenues to meet the public expenditures by the 1st day of July next of $50,000,000, may well arrest the attention of this House and the country. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury discloses the fact that during the last month the current expenses of the Government added $3,659,967.88. to the public debt. In the month previous, your debt was increased $1,397,870.27. And yet, sir, while your Committee on Ways and Means are devising new taxes to meet our prodigal expenditure, gentlemen are deliberately urging upon this House to enter upon a new field of expenditure, a local improvement in one of the States, and propose as a beginning on this isolated work a present appropriation of a million dollars from your Treasury. Is this a proper time, when every industry of the country is sorely depressed and our people struggling under the weight of excessive taxation, to appropriate large sums of money even on works of national importance and of recognized utility? At such a time as this shall we abandon the traditional and constitutional policy of our Government, of confining expenditures from the National Treasury to works of common benefit to the whole people, and tax the whole country for a mere local improvement?

What is the character of this work for which we are asked to appropriate by this bill a million dollars? What is to be its ultimate cost? This bill and the report of your engineers furnish an answer. The bill proposes to construct a canal from Hennepin, on the Illinois River, to Rock Island, on the Mississippi River, supplied with water from Rock River by a feeder canal thirty-eight miles in length. I quote from the report of the engineer:

The estimated cost of the whole work appears from the following summary:

Divisions.	Miles.	Cost.
Eastern division	25.86	$5, 779, 277 24
Western division	39.45	4, 429, 566 13
Feeder division	38.12	2, 270, 849 90
Total	113.43	12, 479, 693 27

And your Committee on Railways and Canals deliberately propose that, with your revenues insufficient to meet the current expenses of the Government, you shall enter upon the construction of this local improvement to cost you ultimately $12,479,693.27, and ask even now a million dollars for a beginning! Do gentlemen think there is no limit to the endurance of labor in bearing taxation—no limit to the patience of our people when the fruits of their industry are squandered in enriching local communities and giving fortunes to skillful manipulators of your revenues? It is true, sir, that this report states that a canal of less capacity than the one for which the estimate is made, that is to say, a canal sixty feet wide at the water line and six feet deep, with locks one hundred and fifty feet long and twenty-one feet wide, can be constructed on the proposed route for $3,899,722.64; but it is too manifest that this bill does not contemplate the construction of a canal of the reduced proportions.

There is the usual ambiguity in this bill common to all questionable schemes to draw money from the Treasury. The language is:

Said canal and said branch shall not be less than seventy feet wide at the water line and not less than six feet in depth of water, with locks not less than one hundred and fifty feet in length and twenty-one feet in width, and with a capacity for vessels of at least two hundred and eighty tons burden; and for that purpose the Secretary of War shall have power and authority, by engineers and agents employed by him, to enter upon any lands for the purpose of making the necessary preliminary examinations and surveys, and to enter upon and appropriate to the use of the United States for the purpose aforesaid any lands for the construction of such canal and branch, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and other erections and fixtures, as may be necessary for the safe and convenient navigation of the said canal and branch.

The minimum proportions only are fixed, but no limit to the magnitude of the work. I am safe in asserting that the purpose of this bill is to construct a work the cost of which, without any estimate for the right of way and land to be submerged by the reservoirs, will be $12,479,693 even according to the estimates, and how much more it is useless to speculate upon.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean to tell the House that this bill contemplates the construction of a canal such as was estimated for at $12,000,000 and over?

Mr. HOLMAN. I say so without any hesitation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That estimate was for a canal of one hundred and sixty feet wide, with locks three hundred and fifty feet in length and seventy-five feet wide.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that very well. The canal already constructed by the State of Illinois from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River, ninety-six miles in length, is comparatively a small canal, the insufficiency of which has been conceded. The improvements of the Illinois River, however, are below that and are on the plan contemplated by the provisions of the act authorizing the survey for this canal. Only a canal made in accordance with this survey would correspond with the improvements in progress on the Illinois River.

But if the Committee on Railways and Canals had intended to limit this work to a canal such as has been incidentally estimated for, to cost $3,899,722.64—a canal sixty feet in width and six feet in depth—why is not the bill so drawn? The bill is drawn for a canal not less than seventy feet wide. Why is there no limitation? The purpose is clearly, sir, to enter upon this work without limitation, and upon the strength of these surveys, that gentlemen may say to Congress, after a million dollars have been expended, that it was manifest from the very terms of this law that provided for the surveys that the intention was to enter upon an enterprise in conformity with the terms of the surveys and the estimates made by the authority of the law authorizing the survey and estimates. The lower estimate was not for such a canal as the survey was authorized for by the law. It was clearly incidental.

The engineer in his report says:

According to original instructions all calculations and estimates for excavation, locks, &c., were to be based on the dimensions recommended for the enlarged Illinois and Michigan canal.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will allow me a few minutes more.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to have ten minutes more.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If my time is extended, I have no objection to the gentleman having ten minutes more.

There being no objection, Mr. HOLMAN'S time was extended.

Mr. HOLMAN. The dimensions of this canal are of little moment; the principle involved is the question at issue. Not only is this scheme in every proper sense a local enterprise, in no sense national, confined to a single State and of local concern even to that State, affecting and promising benefits even to a small portion of the people of the great State of Illinois, and not entitled to be a charge upon the industry of the whole country, but it is a pioneer measure, a part of a system devised by gentlemen preparing a raid upon your Treasury, which, if it shall be consummated, will bring disaster and bankruptcy upon the nation. Hitherto you have improved the national channels of commerce. The improvement of rivers and harbors of national importance, in aid of our internal and foreign commerce, has been recognized as constitutional and proper from the early days of the Government, under the control of the general principle that the improvement aided by the Government should be "of a general, not local, national, not State character." The construction of the Louisville and Portland Canal, the Rock Island Canal, the Des Moines Rapids Canal, the Sault Sainte Mary Canal, connecting Lake Superior and Lake Huron, and other works of a like character by the General Government, come within the recognized principle for such works, improve the great navigable water channels of the country, and each of them improves and promotes the commercial intercourse of many States, not remotely but directly. Your river and harbor bill appropriates annually from four to six million dollars to works in the main of a national character, yet it must be admitted that not infrequently appropriations are made by that bill through inadvertence or insufficiency of information, or through questionable combinations, to which all such legislation is exposed, for works in fact of mere local concern. You have appropriated money in the improvement of two water-channels between the lakes and the Mississippi River, and large sums of money in keeping up the outlets of that great river to the Gulf, but all of these appropriations have been within the scope of your annual appropriations for rivers and harbors, and yet as large as the industry of the country ought to bear.

But within the last two years an extended and vigorous combination has been formed, composed in part of gentlemen animated by a spirit of public enterprise and local interest, and in part of that ever-increasing class of adroit lobbyists, to involve the country in a system of enterprises of startling magnitude, embracing the Atlantic and Great Western Canal, the James River and Kanawha Canal, the Cumberland and Ohio River Canal, the Hennepin Canal, the canal around the falls of the Saint Lawrence River, the Texas and Pacific Railroad, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, the Northern Pacific Railroad, a railroad from New York to Chicago, with a branch to Saint Louis, a railroad from this capital to Saint Louis and Chicago. But why enumerate? I have before me sixty-four bills pending in this House, each seeking an avenue into your Treasury on some pretense of public improvement, and this Capitol literally teems with eager adventurers vigilant in their support. Some of these projects seek a direct road to the Treasury, while the corporations adroitly ask you that their imperial enterprises may be consummated for their exclusive benefit and aggrandizement on the exclusive credit and at the risk of the whole people by your indorsement of their bonds; but all, sir, have a common purpose, private fortunes at the expense of the nation, the benefits of the people incidental and remote. If Congress, in a moment of weakness, shall embark in these visionary schemes, are gentlemen able to estimate how many hundreds of millions it would add to the public debt?

Our people are now staggering under the burden of a vast public debt which even now "takes from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned." Is this debt now such a public blessing that we shall be eager to enlarge it without limit? No, sir; it is now seen that the fears entertained of our fathers of a permanent and heavy public debt were well founded. Our debt and the severe taxation to which it subjects our people are already working a perceptible change in our institutions of Government, transferring, not even with the secrecy of stealth, "power from the many to the few." Corporate power and consolidated wealth, an outgrowth of your public debt, stand behind every public measure imperfectly concealed. The exactions of the public debt and the excessive and ever-increasing expenditures of the Government, are actually exhausting the industries of this country. Gentlemen talk about "panic" in our finances. Panic! We contracted a vast public debt on the basis of a currency enormously inflated and in the interest of capital. You are paying it off in coin, while every financial measure for the last nine years has been dictated by capital your current expenses of government have swollen in nine years from $145,000,000 to $183,000,000, while the volume of your currency has been steadily and remorselessly reduced; you have deliberately relieved capital from taxation and piled the burden on the shoulders of labor; and when by slow and painful steps those measures have produced their legitimate fruits, you call it a "panic." No, sir; it is the exhaustion of your industries. There is a limit, even in a nation like ours, to the capacity of labor to bear taxation. It is only seen in the progress of years. A hopeful, vigorous people like ours, full of recuperative energy, will yield only by degrees to the exhaustive drain, to the weight of excessive taxation. But the result is inevitable. Our industries will revive and business actively will be resumed; but the so-called "panic" will add enormously to the permanently impoverished class of your people. You may conceal the countless avenues through which the vital forces of labor are absorbed by indirect taxation, but you cannot conceal the result. Your system produces excessive private fortunes on the one hand and hopeless poverty on the other. Can gentlemen deliberately propose to increase the public burdens?

But, sir, does this system of internal improvements harmonize with our republican institutions? Have you the right to tax the whole people to promote the interests of favored sections and build up individual fortunes? In a country of such vast extent and of such varied industries, is it possible to arrange the elements of such a system as to benefit even the larger portion of our people? No, sir. You may, by the vast expenditures contemplated, add to the material grandeur of our country and to the brilliancy of its administration, but the bitter fruits of it all would be an impoverished and hopeless people.

There is always at least a plausible argument for the schemes by which public-spirited gentlemen seek to grow rich off of the labor of other men. "Cheap transportation" is now the argument. Have gentlemen noticed that this demand for cheapening the cost of transportation by a system of internal improvements by the General Government sprang up at the moment when the people were proposing to lay their hand on the consolidated corporations which control seventy-three thousand miles of railway and compel these common carriers to transport persons and freights at fair and reasonable rates, as at common law they are bound to do? Was not the first object of this internal-improvement system to divert the people from their purpose? And suppose, sir, these great artificial water-channels were created through a heavy increase of your public debt, can any man who has watched the course of these great corporations doubt that with their absolute control of the carrying trade of the country they would not, by endless discriminations, render these artificial water-channels comparatively valueless? Look, sir, to your great navigable highways even now, and see the result; and is it not apparent that the same power that could prohibit these discriminations could compel these common carriers to fulfill the conditions of common honesty, and carry persons and freight at fair and reasonable rates?

But, sir, one consideration remains which, if there was no other, ought to be conclusive against this system of internal improvements by the General Government. All that is valuable in Government must rest on the integrity and purity of its administration. Does our experience during the last thirteen years invite this country to this new field where the lobby must become a recognized power in government? The first raid was upon your once magnificent public domain, the rightful inheritance of the landless people of this Republic, the only promise and hope and shelter from the oppression and domination of wealth of the laboring people of this country and their children, this imperial possession under the new and vicious force which has seized upon this country and in the name of development and progress seeks to centralize its elements of wealth, has in these thirteen years passed under a monopoly as remorseless as that which has for centuries covered the face of Europe with poverty and wretchedness. That source of private fortunes is exhausted, and the lobby turns its attention to your Treasury and calculates with composure the capacity of our people to endure taxation. During these years vast subsidies in bonds, moneys, and lands have been granted on the ever-present pretense of public improvement and promoting our commerce; and yet it cannot be safely asserted, however humiliating may be the fact, that any one of those measures has been consummated without dishonor to the country.

We have been taught, sir, that virtue and intelligence are the only foundations on which a republic can rest, and that these fundamental attributes must have their highest illustration in the administration of public affairs. Can republican government long survive a settled, widesrspread, and general belief in the corruption of Government? Can all that has been accomplished in the improvement and development of the country during these years through subsidies in bonds, moneys, and lands ever compensate the nation for the humiliation and sense of dishonor that they have been consummated by fraud and corruption in the trusted repositories of the public power? O, no, sir. Our fathers well knew that a plain, frugal system, confined to the simple duties of government, meting out equal and exact justice to all, exciting no wild schemes of sudden fortune to tempt cupidity and deprave the sense of honor, and leaving the development of the country to the vigor and energy of the people, unoppressed with taxation, was the only path of safety. In those days a public trust was sacred, and the nation was never humiliated by the venality of its public men. But the era of subsidy is upon us; a splendid government and a brilliant capital, with the industries of the nation prostrate and an impoverished people.

The era of subsidy is upon us, and a principal employment of each successive Congress is inquiring into the venality and corruption of their predecessors and devising new subsidies under more attractive and specious forms, and devising new taxes upon the people.

If you would restore purity and true greatness to the Government and honor and justice to its administration, you must retrace your steps, and limit your legislation to the measures that involve the interests and welfare of the whole nation; frown down the teeming and countless schemes of restless and unscrupulous adventurers that crowd into this Hall, seeking to make your Treasury a convenient agency for amassing private fortunes.

The Policy of the Republican Party toward the Southern States.

SPEECH OF HON. W. M. ROBBINS

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union–

Mr. ROBBINS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is undeniable that the policy pursued toward the South since the late war, with the ostensible purpose of rehabilitating that section and restoring to it prosperity, happiness, and hopefulness, has resulted in a most lamentable failure. This is substantially confessed, even by the partisans of the Administration, in the continual charges they are making, that the South is full of violence, disorder, and bloodshed, and that there is no security there for the personal and political rights of a large class of the citizens. Representing in part one of those Southern States, I indignantly repel the accusations of violence and lawlessness put forth against our people, as basely false and slanderous, born either of pitiable ignorance or diabolical hate. But that the course of treatment to which the South has been subjected with a view to its restoration has been somehow or other fatally defective is amply demonstrated by the fact that that naturally fertile and glorious region lies this day in ruins, while the people, after ten years of weary waiting and untold hardships and self-denial, are not only bankrupt, but profoundly disheartened and dismayed at the prospect before them—indeed, contemplate the future with less hope and courage than they did on the day of the surrender. It is a sad, fearful spectacle to see an entire people, by nature proud, brave, energetic, and high-spirited, reduced to the verge of despair by poverty, oppression, robbery, slander, and the persistent injustice and implacable hatred of their rulers. Such is to-day the miserable situation of those ten millions of white men who fill that immense domain stretching from the Potomac yonder to the far-off Rio Grande.

Instead of rebuilding the waste places left by the war, our desolation grows more desolate; no progress, no money, no accumulation of property, no opening to enterprise, no hope. Need we ask who is responsible for all this? There is no difficulty in determining where the responsibility rests. It rests upon the leaders and so-called statesmen of the republican party. The close of the war found that party omnipotent in this country, occupying all the departments of the Government, controlling the Army, and having, also, all the prestige of the great victory just won in the field—a conjunction of favoring circumstances which might have insured to that party perpetual predominance had not the splendor of its achievements been so soon eclipsed by the magnitude of what I shall call its mistakes—history will call them crimes. The task of rehabilitating the defeated States, and replacing them in their normal relations to the rest of the Union, necessarily fell into the hands of the radical leaders. It was theirs to devise and execute the plans for this purpose, and there was none to say them nay or seriously obstruct them. Statesmanship never had a grander opportunity nor a nobler field in which to exhibit its resources of skill and beneficence. But behold the fruits. Failure, shameful, wretched failure, is the outcome of it all. The people of the whole country have said so in the verdict of utter condemnation they gave in the late elections against the republican party and its policy.

In spite of the overwhelming defeat that party has so recently experienced on account of its mistaken course, its leaders here show no signs of heeding the popular voice, and the Administration appears more recklessly resolved than ever to push forward in the path of usurpation. These men seem stricken with a fatal blindness, so that they cannot or will not see that their aims are really destructive to all that the American people hold dear. They imagine or pretend that they are saving the institutions of the country, and yet fail to comprehend that those institutions, when transformed as they seek to have them, would really be destroyed or not worth saving. For example, they are trying to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in order to secure (as they say) free and fair elections, forgetting that the only object of elections ought to be to preserve such sacred privileges as the writ of habeas corpus from ever being suspended.

The reasons which urge the republican party forward still in its unwise course are the same that have led to failure in its whole policy toward the South. It may be useful to inquire concerning the reasons of that failure. I shall not have time to notice many of them, but only one or two of the most prominent.

The first that I will mention is that the men who have controlled the republican party never did know the South, or understand its people. Unlike every other political organization which has ever existed in the United States, the republican party is and has been always essentially a sectional party—a thing which the Father of his Country warned the people against in his farewell address. In its birth that party was sectional. When it acceded to power in 1860 it was exclusively sectional, and the natural result of its entrance into authority was the hostile array of the two sections against each other in mortal strife. To this day that party remains sectional in its whole spirit and tone and leadership, and mainly so in its composition; for, with the exception of a small minority of honest, but poorly-informed men, its only supporters in the South are the negroes and carpet-baggers, and a few pliable gentlemen who joined it for the sake of office and spoils. During the six years of Grant's administration, no southern man of any race or color has occupied a place in his cabinet. Instead of giving men of that section a share in the Federal administration, it has been common to send northern men down to fill the offices among us, to be legislators and governors for our States, thus converting them into radical satrapies instead of self-governing commonwealths. In brief, under the republican party one end of this country governs the other, and home-rule is utterly ignored.

If the northern people wish to understand how grinding and irritating this is to us let them imagine the tables turned and consider how they would like to have the people of the South intermeddling in all their local and domestic concerns; watching with a jealous and suspicious eye all the movements of their social life; espousing the cause of one class of their population against another; interfering between the capitalist and the operative in Massachusetts or the employer and the miner in Pennsylvania; recognizing or deposing governors, and setting up or putting down State governments at pleasure; imagining all manner of evil concerning them and ever ready to believe the lying stories of their enemies, and renegades; showering all our favors upon the base and venal among them, or upon corrupt political adventurers whom our own society had vomited forth upon them; driving immigration and capital away by holding them up to the world as brutal and barbarous; speaking of them commonly as traitors, murderers, and bandits; sending our military officers among them to hector, browbeat, and threaten; and if under all these accumulated injuries and insults they showed the least anger and resentment, or despair drove them to any rashness, feeling all the tyrant rising up in our souls and longing to clutch them by the throat and crush them into the earth as rebel slaves. Look on this picture, O, men of the North, and tell me, how would you like to have it yours? It is ours. Were that condition your own would you believe yourselves living under a free government? Would your philosophy and self-control enable you to be always calm, always wise? Would not the American freeman's soul within you sometimes burst forth in wild passion and irrepressible rage? We are learning to bear these things with patience. Patience and endurance are our watchwords, and will, I hope, continue to be so under all the provocations of those who apparently seek to madden us that they may make capital out of our exhibitions of just resentment. Such trials are sore indeed, and would crush the manly spirit of almost any people; but there is a vitality, a fortitude, and a high mettle in that magnificent race of southern white men which will, I trust, enable them to go successfully through the dreadful ordeal and come out of the crucible with finer, grander, nobler qualities, and fitted to stamp their impress upon the pages of future history in characters even more resplendent than those which record their past.

Because the radical leaders did not know the South, nor the motives and spirit of its action, nor the real temper of its people, they never comprehended the problem they were set to solve at the close of the war. The task of restoring the Union at that time was far easier and simpler than will ever be believed by those who have so wofully bungled over it. Even assuming that the southern people, in entering upon that great conflict of arms, committed an error of judgment, nevertheless, it is beyond doubt that they were faithful to their solemn convictions of duty; that they were true to their honest opinions concerning the adjustment of powers under our system of government; and that they verily believed their cause was the cause of true liberty on this continent. With this faith in them tens of thousands died for that cause with the purest motives of patriotism, and with the cheerful resignation of martyrs. These are sober truths, and I should think the northern people would love to recognize them as such. If they do not, they must judge all those millions of men who are now their countrymen to be conscious and willful traitors and criminals of the worst type, and surely there would be small satisfaction in thinking thus of so large a number of those who are fellow-citizens with them of this great country. On the other hand no one questions that those who fought on the side of the Union were likewise honest, patriotic, and thoroughly true to their sense of duty, and the cause of liberty and country as they viewed it. The differences of opinion which divided the combatants were as old as the Government itself. They had been debated bitterly in this very Hall for two generations, but they remained undecided until finally referred to the dread arbitrament of arms where each side maintained its views with a heroism and devotion which struck the nations with awe and shed undying luster upon the American name. The South was overpowered in the fight. Her people gave up forever all claim of the right of secession, and submitted without repining to the abolition of slavery as having been the immediate occasion of the contest in which they were defeated. When the issue was fairly decided by overwhelming, through the force of numbers, their armies in the field, they yielded at once. There never was a great war that ended so suddenly and left so little resentment in the minds of the vanquished. They might have kept up a guerrilla war for an indefinite period, and bankrupted the continent. But they yielded to their fate with that resignation which became a brave and patriotic and Christian people, as they are; for they felt they were surrendering not merely to the bayonets of their adversaries, but to the inscrutable decree of the God of battles; and they felt, also, that the welfare of their country required that, if they yielded at all, they should yield without reserve. That people, whose types and leaders were God-fearing heroes, like Jackson and Lee, may have been mistaken, but must have been conscientious.

How easily could the breach between the sections have been healed then by the exercise of magnanimity and wise forbearance on the part of those who shaped the policy of the victors. Suppose, when the folds of the old flag of our fathers, so glorious with their deeds, floated out over us again, there had come with it the assurance that we were under the ægis of constitutional law and liberty, even as understood by our adversaries when the fight began. Suppose it had been said to us, "You have sought to divide the Union. That never shall be done. But, having saved the Union and destroyed the institution which threatened it, we now invite you back to your place under the common Government. Let us forget our strifes and be brothers again, and unite in building up and beautifying our common glorious heritage." Could there but have been in the rulers of this country the faith and charity to have spoken such words, the winds and waves of sectional conflict would soon have subsided into a great calm, and the people would have well-nigh forgotten, before this time, the horrors of that strife. I say this knowing as well as any how the defeated felt, for I was one of those who fought it through to the last, with my whole soul enlisted in the cause, and with no thought of giving it up while there remained a shadow of hope; and the bitterness of defeat was made more poignant to me by the recollection of many dearest friends fallen in vain.

I have heard republicans in this Congress boast of their magnanimity to the South in that they put nobody to death after the war. Well, as I will not be unfair or unjust, I deem it due to say, what is a matter for universal pride and congratulation, that the American people, both North and South, are free from that blood-thirsty temper which marks some races of men, and which takes delight in blood and butchery for their own sake. History will record with satisfaction the fact that no vengeful slaughter of vanquished foes added to the rivers of fraternal blood which the war itself had shed. But candor requires the confession that no such slaughter could have occurred except through wanton barbarity, and in contravention of the law; for it is, I believe, well understood that even the confederate president was released from prison without a trial for treason because the ablest jurists of the country gave it as their opinion that he could not be convicted under the laws of the land; and the Government of the United States, having triumphed in the field, did not care to risk submitting the questions thereby decided to a new trial before a court and jury. Pardon my saying another thing. If the death-penalty had been resorted to, whether by regular trials in the law-courts or through drum-head courts-martial, it would have been out of the question to put to death the whole southern people, or even any considerable portion of them. Perhaps a hundred, or at all events, a thousand victims would have satisfied even a bloodthirsty people, and I have already said that the men of the North are not of that disposition. Now, I hope I shall not be considered as indulging in bravado when I express the deliberate opinion that if the southern people could have foreseen all that has befallen them since the surrender—the infinite wrong and ruin, the oppressions, humiliations, petty insults, and indescribable villainies—and had been offered the choice of suffering all that or, on the other hand, to stand up and abide the casting of the lot, so as to furnish from their whole number a thousand men to be offered up as a sacrifice to the wrath of their enemies, they would have chosen the latter alternative as the more merciful.

Frequent reference is also made in the debates here to the liberality which has been shown to southern men in the removal of disabilities and restoration to the privileges of citizenship. But it ought not to be forgotten that those who now boast of removing disabilities first imposed those disabilities, and for the most selfishly partisan purpose, that they might tie the hands of the most intelligent and experienced class of the southern people until carpet-baggers and negroes, backed up by the military, could seize upon the governments of all those States and control them for the republican party. The manner in which those disabilities were imposed, was also in violation of every principle of justice and liberty, for they were in the nature of penalties laid upon individuals without trial, and for offenses whereof they were never convicted. Their operation was most unfair and inequitable, for they often fell upon men who had been at heart faithful to the Union, while many of the most active confederates entirely escaped. Those disabilities were never removed until the radical leaders supposed their grip upon the South was too secure ever to be seriously endangered by any opposition. And now, when they behold the intellect and virtue of the South once more partially unfettered, and advancing to that supremacy there which those attributes always will and ought to maintain in every community of enlightened people, the Administration in Washington becomes profoundly uneasy, because ignorance and dishonesty are losing control of the South; and at this very moment the most high-handed and tyrannical schemes are being devised here by which new shackles may be put on the limbs of southern white men, so that the subservient tools of the Administration may be enabled to wriggle their slimy way up again into place and power in that hapless section. All this is done, too, upon the pretext that the South is plotting a renewal of the war, when every man in America with a spoonful of brains ought to know that such an idea is as preposterous as it would be to expect a volcano to burst out this day on Pennsylvania avenue.

No; the course of the leaders of the dominant party is not and never has been magnanimous toward the South, but tyrannical, unpatriotic, exasperating, and thoroughly selfish.

For one, I have always believed if that kind-hearted man who was assassinated in this city on the 14th of April, 1865, had lived to deal with the problem of reconstruction, the South would have been generously treated, and would have been happy and prosperous long ago. Not that the man who succeeded him in the Presidency was wanting in honesty or faithfulness to his sense of duty; but Abraham Lincoln was the only man able to control the republican party who possessed the spirit of clemency and charity. There were many other men in high place equal to him, perhaps, in intellect, but he alone of them all seems to have had any soul. O, mysterious Fate! to quench the warm pulses of that kind heart, and turn us over to the tender mercies of bitter, implacable tyrants!

Among the causes which have gone far to produce incalculable evils to the whole country, and greatly hindered the solution of the problem of southern restoration, must be specially noted that selfish ambition of the radical leaders which has prompted, and still prompts them, to labor with far more zeal for the perpetuation of their own political ascendency than for the welfare of the American people and the preservation of our free institutions. I say the leaders, because I wish it to be well understood that in this as well as every other point of my arraignment of the republican party, I draw a broad line of distinction between the motives of those leaders, and of the masses who have followed and been misled by them. I believe in the people. I have an abiding faith in the upright and patriotic impulses of the popular masses, both North and South, in their fidelity to the principles of free government, and in their wish to do right, if they know what right is, and are not misled by demagogues and deceivers.

I am satisfied that the northern people, and especially those gallant Union soldiers who constitute so considerable a part of that people, and between whom and us there sprang up so profound a respect for each other in the long and well-fought contest, would never have sanctioned the unjust and despotic measures imposed upon the South if they could have known our real situation and purposes, and if their passions and prejudices had not been aroused against us by those scheming, daring plotters who sought a selfish advantage from these sectional strifes and hatreds. It is upon these, and not upon the people whom they have deceived, that my censures are meant to fall. What words can portray the wickedness of those who have not allowed the people of the two bleeding sections of this country to be at peace, though the fight was over; who have kept alive the strife; who have fanned the flames of discord; who have, for ten long years, been nurturing the seeds of hate, because out of all this wide-spread misery and ruin they could reap preferment or coin gold for themselves? Surely, surely, the execrations of posterity and the maledictions of Heaven must light upon such unparalleled criminality!

When the subject is looked at closely, it is astounding to perceive how greatly the leaders of the republican party have been governed in their whole policy by the ambition to strengthen their own grasp upon the reins of power. Common sense might have taught that, in rebuilding the shattered fabric of civil institutions in the South, those classes of people should have been allowed to bear a share in the work whose experience and knowledge of affairs fitted them for it. But, by the ingenious contrivance of disfranchisement and test-oaths, most of those men were banned and excluded from the councils of their respective States and communities at that most trying and important crisis. Why was this done? Simply because those were men of too stubborn and independent material to become the tools of the dominant party. It is false to say they were excluded because they would have been dangerous to the country by forming new plans to reopen the war. Every man knew that this was impossible; and none knew it better than those who, having just overthrown the mighty armies of the confederacy, felt themselves able to put down, without the slightest effort, any new outbreak. No, sir; those men would have built well enough for the welfare and peace of the country, for the restoration of the Union, for the happiness and renewed prosperity of the defeated States—ay, they were the only men, with a few exceptions, who could secure these things—but they would not serve the ends of the radical leaders. It was not happy, prosperous, resurrected States that were wanted; it was States that would vote the radical ticket. A restored Union was not the object, but a Union in which the radical leaders could rule and revel in power and plunder.

For the same reason the poor, confiding, ignorant freedmen were given the ballot, all utterly unprepared as they were to use it except for their own injury and that of the communities of which they formed a component part. No impartial man can deny that the grant of universal suffrage to the colored race so soon after their liberation was a most dangerous experiment, full of peril to popular government, fraught with evil to that race itself, and leading to inevitable civil confusion and pecuniary ruin in several States. Even its mad authors shrank back at first from this measure and confessed it wild and impracticable. But the need of votes for their party overcame their scruples and drove them on to perpetrate what I unhesitatingly denounce here, as I have often done elsewhere, as a crime against civilization. When I speak thus, I know there are those who will seek to pervert my meaning and charge me with hostility to the colored people. But I have no such feeling, nor have those whom I represent here. Between the southern white people and the negroes, with scarcely an exception, there always existed a good understanding and sentiments of friendship and kindly regard. This is incomprehensible to those self-conceited fanatics whose knowledge of southern affairs is not derived from a study of the facts but "evolved from their own inner consciousness" and poisoned with prejudice.

No friend of the negro could fail to perceive that the preservation of those relations of mutual confidence and benevolence between him and the white people among whom his lot is cast is of the highest importance to him. But these pretended friends of the negro have done all they could to bring about race antagonisms. The negro, when freed and thrown out to shift for himself, needed to go to work industriously and without distraction, so as to secure a competency for himself and his family. But the radicals diverted him from this plain road of honest thrift, and made him a noisy, lazy politician, and in too many cases the only thing he does now is to steal and vote, while the men he elects to office govern and steal. Suffrage was given to him, they said, to enable him to protect himself, and now they say suffrage is no protection, but a peril to him; and they propose to pass the most extraordinary laws, even going so far as to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in order to secure to the negro his right to vote. Through such contradictory theories and inconsistent pretexts the devious policy of the radical leaders proceeds, consistent only in this, that its sole and constant aim is their own aggrandizement.

Instead of fostering peace between the races, so needful to both and especially to the weaker, these selfish men banded the negroes together in secret, oath-bound leagues, instilled into their minds jealousy and hostility toward the white people, led them to the polls en masse to vote into office the vilest of men, used them to overthrow the governments and plunder the people of States, to ruin credit, insult decency, and trample out all hope of prosperity; in short, these men have led the negroes to disgrace themselves by their miserable failures in spheres of action for which they were unfit, and also to become, as far as possible, a nuisance to the communities in which they live. In spite of all this, the generous-hearted people of the South, who know the poor negro, do not hate him—they only pity him. They know that he is little to blame for it all, for in his ignorance he has simply been the deluded tool of designing hypocrites, who told him pleasing lies, but cared nothing for him except to get his vote.

One of the great incidental injuries done the negro in this whole business is that he has been taught to depend so entirely on others and not on himself for his advancement—a trait which is naturally prominent in his negative, parasitical character, and needs to be eradicated and not fostered, if you would make a man of him. Another thing is the wild and extravagant notions that have been awakened in his bosom concerning what is to be done for him, concerning his rights and his wrongs, and his whole relations to the American Government and people. For example, some of you sedulously inculcate upon the negro, and try yourselves to believe, that his inferiority in mental and moral advancement is the result of his former subjection in the South. I have more than once heard the expression on this floor that the "negro has been brutalized by southern slavery." It is time for such preposterous and slanderous nonsense to stop. A century or two ago the negroes went into that slavery, a few utterly degraded, besotted, grub-eating, snake-worshiping savages. Ten years ago they came out from that yoke, millions of civilized, Christianized men, even able, in your opinion, to help govern this glorious country. Strange "brutalizing" that!

But the negro is kept unhappy and restless with the idea that he is still a terribly wronged man. Instead of teaching him to use wisely the gifts he has received, you keep him pining for some great imaginary blessing still ahead, some El Dorado, some Hesperian garden, to which your legislation is to transport him, where the ills which, alas, must always oppress poor humanity, white and black alike, cannot come. I was greatly struck with this thought the other day during the debate on the so-called "civil-rights" bill. One colored member said, "Pass this bill and give my people a chance in the race of life." Another said, "Give us our liberties; give us our rights; give us our privileges." No thought seemed to enter their minds that anything had yet been done for them, or that there was any savor of absurdity or ingratitude in their present clamor. A few years ago those men were slaves, hoeing in some master's cotton-patch or corn-field. Now, they are not only freed and made citizens, but promoted to be rulers and law-makers for the proudest nation in the world. If there be a spectacle on earth more transcendently ludicrous than all others it certainly is to behold a corn-field negro standing up in the Congress of the United States and exclaiming in piteous tones of grief and supplication, "Do give the poor African some chance; give us our rights; give us our liberties."

After what I have said in regard to the folly and absurdity of the policy which has been pursued with respect to the negro, it is proper that I should add that I know of no serious purpose on the part of anybody to deprive the negro of the privilege of voting, or any other privilege which has been conferred on him. We do, some of us, think that the Government might wisely cease to bolster up ignorance and incompetency, mainly represented by the negro, stop interfering with the natural order of things, and trying to make the pyramid stand on its apex, and allow the virtue and intelligence of the South, at present mainly found with the white race, to resume their normal control in that section. The radical plan is to make slaves of ten million white men for the pretended good of four million blacks. Ours is to so shape the conduct of affairs that all, both white and black, may be happy and free. In a word, our principle is "home rule." Since every other programme has failed, would it not now be wise to try this?

Another grand reason, which I must mention but have not time to elaborate, why the radical policy has failed to restore confidence and tranquillity to the South and to the whole country, is that the leaders of that party have been secretly engaged in revolutionizing our Government in its very essence. They never have been willing to see the Government re-established on the basis whereon the fathers founded it, even with slavery abolished and the privileges of the negro guaranteed. Herein is a marvelous thing, and yet true, that those who prate so much about the "life of the Government" should be seeking to destroy it indirectly. In the Inter-Ocean, one of the most prominent organs of radical opinion, I observed only a few days since the bold avowal "that this is no longer a government founded on the consent of the people, but a government of force."

If I mistake not, the American people will soon demonstrate to everybody that they entertain a very different opinion. But radicalism would make our Government one of force. It has been trying for years to rule ten millions of citizens by force and fear; and if it could succeed, pray how much liberty would be left in the land? There are persons even in this Congress whose geography seems to be at fault, and who talk about affairs in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, as if those were provinces in Central or South America, whose sufferings and wrongs could not vitally affect them, forgetting that the gangrene which is beginning there at the extremities will soon eat into the heart of the body-politic, if it is not arrested. But we are told that the "results of the war" must be secured, and it is under this pretext that most of the dangerous innovations in our system of government are being made. Of course, as one of those who fought on the other side, I cannot, with decorum, say that you ought not to secure the legitimate results of the war; but every American has a right to ask what they are.

The war was begun to prevent the division of the Union. That was the prime cause for which your brave men came forth in such overwhelming numbers against us. Has not that result been secured? Has it not been ten years since we sheathed our swords, hauled down our bullet-rent battle-flags, and swore by the honor of soldiers to accept the Union as perpetual? You ought to believe us, for whatever else we have done, we have never deceived you. We did not do so at the beginning of that war. There was no sneaking conspiracy nor dishonorable double-dealing on our side then. Our Representatives went forth from these halls proclaiming openly the purpose of the South. Our movements were all made in the broad daylight, without any attempt at concealment or fraud. Standing before you, therefore, in the attitude of men who have never been false to honor, we demand that you trust us when we give our sworn pledges of eternal fidelity to the Union. If any outside foe should attack it, we shall see who can strike the most gallant blows in its defense. During the war the issue was extended so as to include the abolition of negro slavery. Many of your soldiers were displeased, but they were induced to acquiesce upon the plea that it was this slavery that had endangered the Union. Thus the war was fought through and no other question arose during its continuance. The negro was freed, every Southern State so amending its constitution as forever to prohibit involuntary servitude within its borders.

Thus both the objects of the war were attained, the perpetuity of the Union and the emancipation of the negro. All other pretended results of the war, of which we hear so much, are ingenious subterfuges, invented long since the war by those who were seeking excuses by which they could cajole a confiding people into supporting them in the most selfish and sinister designs. And so subtle an influence have these plotters acquired, that if any American looks back to and longs for something like the republic of the fathers he is hooted at as a "Bourbon." The results of the war, indeed! Why, sir, if the gallant heroes who fell under the Stars and Stripes could see the ruin you have wrought, the outrages you have perpetrated, States wrecked, millions of white men enslaved, the travesties of governments you have set up, bayonets in legislative halls, farce and tragedy stalking alternately across the stage, American free institutions themselves in deadly peril, and could hear you say this was what they fought and died for, they would turn over in their graves this day.

My time is nearly out, and I must close, leaving many things unsaid which ought to be said, in justice to the honest, patriotic people who sent me here. Before I ever came to Congress, I longed for the opportunity to speak to the people of the North from some elevated platform like this, and tell them the real feelings and purposes of the sorely-maligned people of my section, believing that, if the popular masses of both sections could understand one another, we should at once see genuine peace and friendship restored. This I have endeavored to do on the few occasions during this term of Congress when I could obtain the floor; but in doing this, you can bear witness that I never have spoken (as I never shall) in the whining tones of the whipped spaniel, but in the independent and fearless spirit of a freeman who represents freemen. We speak out boldly and bluntly our thoughts, because we have no sinister designs to cover up, and we are too proud to be treacherous. If ever the time shall come here when I must tune my voice to soft accents and speak with bated breath for fear of offending some tyrant then I shall leave these halls forever, and, seeking a home in some quiet cove of our mountains, try to forget that I ever had a country.

But, thank God, no such evil foreboding is called for now, for the future is brightening, and the old-time spirit of American liberty is awaking out of sleep. The great North has seen through the mists of misrepresentation with which radicalism has so long hid the truth respecting the affairs of the South, and in the fall elections pronounced her emphatic condemnation of the men in power. We in the South understand what this means. It means that our fellow-countrymen of the Northern States are willing to trust our patriotic fidelity to the common country, its institutions, its grand progressive aims, and its future greatness and glory; and we are resolved not to disappoint their confidence. I am aware that hard trials await us, and we shall be subjected to severe temptations. I know that the radical leaders, in their chagrin at the prospect of deposition from power, are concocting the most desperate and daring measures for the purpose of recovering control in the South. They even contemplate a suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, that great safeguard of personal liberty, in order to harass, oppress, and exasperate the southern people and drive them to desperation. Ominous whispers are heard in the political circles of this city that the intention is to provoke outbreaks and bloodshed in the Southern States, and that legislation aimed really to bring about these things is to be perfected before this session of Congress terminates. Thus a pretext is to be sought for sending the military into all those States to intimidate and overawe the people, and either secure their votes in the next presidential election or find excuses for throwing them out of the count. Let me say to these desperate schemers that we mean to foil their plans by the sublimity of our patience. Keep the peace, obey the law, and trust in God and the justice of the American people. These are the guiding stars by which we shall continue to steer; and we look forward with confident anticipations to the achievement of a glorious victory by the conservative and democratic voters of the North and South in the great contest of 1876, when a President who reveres the Constitution and respects popular rights shall take control of affairs, and the centennial of American Independence shall dawn upon our country happy and united, and our free Government rescued from the perils which now threaten it.

Troubles in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. C. W. MILLIKEN,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MILLIKEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the patient indulgence of the House for a very brief period, that I may consider and offer my views to some extent upon the unhappy condition in which we find the State of Louisiana.

Indeed, I feel that silence on such occasions would be but little if any better than crime; and if a crime, I wish here and now to enter my protest against the interference in that State by the military, that my silence heretofore may to some extent be mitigated.

Before the late war individuals and States alike were free from molestation and intimidation at the hands of the Federal Government or any of its Departments. To-day neither is free from either. We have indeed fallen upon evil times. We were told that the war was being prosecuted for the preservation and maintenance of the Union of the States and the liberties of the people. Not a mere union of the States as territories, but for the preservation of local self-government, as had before, in all the history of our country, existed. Impressed with this idea, and moved to action by the highest impulses of patriotism and with the hope, too, that this was in good faith the purpose of the war, the Northern, Eastern, and Middle States, together with many individuals of each of the Southern States, came forward with a unanimity unparalleled in the annals of history and offered their treasures and their lives to the country. Billions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives were given up for these purposes and for these alone. It was solemnly declared that the war was not being prosecuted for conquest or subjugation, but to maintain the integrity of the Union and preserve the liberties of the people.

Sir, ten years have elapsed since it was declared from the highest official authority known to civil government that the war was over. Then if it is over, why are not each of the States free and independent as before the war, if the war was in good faith prosecuted for the maintenance of the integrity of the Union and the preservation of the liberties of the people, and not for conquest or subjugation? Why is it, sir, that the State of Louisiana is to-day held in subjugation by the military power of the United States, which I charge to be true? To establish this charge as true I need but go back to the election for governor in that State in the year 1872; nor will I go further into that history than to notice the message of the President in response to a resolution of the Senate of January 8, 1875, calling on him for information as to any interference by any military officer or any part of the Army of the United States with the organization or proceedings of the General Assembly of that State in either branch of it, and also inquiring in regard to the existence of armed organizations in that State hostile to the government thereof, and intent on overturning such government by force. In response to this resolution he says:

Resulting from these proceedings, through various controversies and complications, a State administration was organized with William P. Kellogg as governor, who in the discharge of my duty under section 4 article 4 of the Constitution I have recognized as the governor of the State.

In the very next sentence he uses the following language:

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result. Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion had more right to it than his competitor.

It will be remembered that the President claims to derive authority from the fourth article and fourth section of the Constitution for aiding Kellogg in maintaining his seat as governor. That section is as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

This article and section are clear, plain, and unmistakable, wholly free from ambiguity; no two or more constructions can be given it. The President may interpose with the whole powers of the United States to suppress domestic violence by virtue of this authority when called on by the Legislature of the State for that purpose. If it is not in session, and cannot be convened within practicable time for the purpose, then the governor of the State may call on him and he is authorized to act in the premises, and in no other state of case can he dare act without violating the Constitution.

Now, let us see if he is sustained in his course toward that State by the authority cited. The Legislature did not call on him, nor is it claimed by him that it did. But Kellogg did make application for protection upon the ground that domestic violence existed. Then if Kellogg was truly and in fact the governor at the time of his application, the President was not only justifiable in his course but was right in all he did.

The question therefore naturally presents itself, Was Kellogg the governor? I answer he was not, no more than the President himself was, and without referring to the evidence on this subject, or the debates of Congress in both ends of this Capitol in a former session of Congress, I will make good the assertion by the testimony of the President alone, in the message and words above quoted, in which he admits that "it is not altogether certain that Kellogg was elected." Then if not altogether certain, a doubt necessarily existed, and if doubt existed how could the President find in the section of the Constitution cited authority for his action when it expressed none in cases of a doubtful governor? The section referred to means, if it means anything, the man who received the majority of votes legally cast under the form and requirements of the laws of that State for the election of a governor, not the probably or possibly elected governor, not the questionably or doubtfully elected governor, but the governor de facto et de jure.

Again the President says:

The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result.

If a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns, in the name of all that is reasonable and right and fair can he claim justification for his action from this article and section? For nowhere in it does it say in case of a fraudulent election in a State for governor he or the Legislature may interpose; nor can the inference be reasonably drawn by the most extravagant stretch of imagination. But he says:

Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion had more right to it than his competitor.

If, as he says, the election was a gigantic fraud and there are no reliable returns, how is it that possession gave him any more right than his opponent? Fraud never invests one with a right, nor does possession which is obtained by fraud invest the possessor with any more right than if it did not exist. Sir, his possession of the office conferred upon him no more right than the possession of the same office by a stranger to the State, without first having received a majority of the lawful vote of the State. This is a condition-precedent to a legal possession of the office which must exist before the possession can be justified or excused, for if he did not receive a majority of the lawful votes, he was then and is now a usurper and a criminal, and the President would therefore, in that event, not only be aiding and abetting, but maintaining and protecting crime. I do not use these expressions in any unkind spirit toward the President, but because they are the only rational deductions to be drawn from his own statement of the facts.

Ours, sir, is a government of delegated powers, and I hold that it is never safe to exercise a power that is in doubt as to whether or not it is delegated, more especially should it not be so exercised as to hazard the liberties of the people of an entire State. The action of the President is without justification or excuse, to my mind, from the facts as given by himself, for they convict Kellogg of usurpation because his election "was a gigantic fraud and the returns uncertain."

Having, as I think, upon the testimony of the President clearly established the fact that Kellogg is not the governor of Louisiana and never was, I wish to call your attention to the late legislative election and the occurrences attending the effort to organize that Legislature.

This epoch in our history, sir, is pregnant with the direst consequences. On the 4th of January last, gentlemen claiming to be representatives of the people in that Legislature assembled in the city of New Orleans and attempted to organize themselves into a legislative body, (much confusion existed, doubtless through wrongs committed on the part of both political parties,) when it was broken up and disbanded by the armed military forces of the United States acting under orders of an officer of the Government. Of this the President says he knew nothing until the 5th of January, the day after they were dispersed; he learned it from the newspapers; and he further says:

I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence.

Then for this unlawful and unwarranted act he is not to blame. But there is no apology for his acquiescence in and continuance of the act after it was committed; in fact, a vein of approval is seen throughout his entire message of the 8th of January; and on the 6th of January, two days after the occurrence, General Belknap, Secretary of War, and one of the President's Cabinet and advisers, telegraphs from this city to General Sheridan at New Orleans, and at the time in command of the United States troops there, that—

Your telegrams all received. The President and all of us have full confidence and thoroughly approve your course.

Though General Sheridan did not give the order to disperse the Legislature, if I mistake not he was in the city of New Orleans at the time it was given, and on the same evening took command of that city with other parts of the South. He takes command without one word of dissent or disapproval at the outrage perpetrated by the military, but on the other hand he approves all that had been done, and in addition to his approval of these usurpations he says:

[Telegram.]

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE MISSOURI,
New Orleans, January 4, 1875. (Received 4—11.45 p. m.)

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

It is with deep regret that I have to announce to you the existence in this State of a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority and an insecurity of life which is hardly realized by the General Government or the country at large. The lives of citizens have become so jeopardized that unless something is done to give protection to the people, all security usually afforded by law will be overridden. Defiance to the laws and the murder of individuals seem to be looked upon by the community here from a stand-point which gives impunity to all who choose to indulge in either, and the civil government appears powerless to punish or even arrest. I have to-night assumed control over the Department of the Gulf.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General United States Army.

Who does he mean when he says there is a spirit of defiance to all lawful authority? Why, sir, he means the conservatives who, as I will show before I am through, were swindled out of their seats in the Legislature as the people's representatives by the Kellogg party, who are misleading and deceiving both General Sheridan and the President.

I have no doubt but the people did feel outraged, as in truth they were, and gave utterances to some unguarded expressions of their indignation at the manner in which they were treated. They are more than human if they did not. General Sheridan seems to have received everything communicated to him by the Kellogg party as true, and everything from the conservatives as untrue; for when the dispatch last read was sent to the Secretary of War, he had certainly not been in New Orleans a sufficient length of time to have acquired a true state of the facts from his own observation.

But to denounce them as defying all law and as murderers is not severe enough for him. On the next day he says, in a dispatch to the Secretary of War:

Please say to the President that he need give himself no uneasiness about the condition of affairs here. I will preserve the peace, which it is not hard to do with the naval and military forces in and about the city; and if Congress will declare the White Leagues, and other similar organizations, white or black, banditti, I will relieve it from the necessity of any special legislation for the preservation of peace and equality of rights in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, and the Executive from much of the trouble heretofore had in this section of the country.

It is not hard to preserve the peace with the Army and Navy in and around the city, and yet he asks Congress to pass a law declaring this people banditti, that he may try them by court-martial and shoot them down as so many outlaws or mad dogs, simply because they, like American citizens everywhere, are jealous of their liberties and are clamorous, if you please, for their rights under the Constitution equal with the other States of the Union.

But now the cry of rebel, secession, and traitor serves as a justification for all wrongs to individuals and abuses of constitutional rights in the States that were once in rebellion against the Government, when the truth is there has not been an armed force in a State of this Union since peace was declared that could not have been suppressed without the slightest danger by the properly elected executive of the State if left to the States to settle their own troubles. If peace is what you wish, why do you not secure to each individual voter perfect and ample security at the polls, whatever may be his politics, and not wait until unlimited and unrestrained fraud has been committed throughout the State at its elections, and then come forward with the Army and in every instance declare your own particular partisan elected? You have no right to do either; but if either and nothing will satisfy you but to interfere, in the name of peace, if not for the sake of republican government, do the former. You will not then have to keep standing armies in the States to terrify and intimidate her people.

As shown by the returns of the commissioners of election, compiled and forwarded by the supervisors of registration, the conservatives of Louisiana had a majority of twenty-nine members in the lower house out of one hundred and eleven. But these returns had to go through a rectifying and refining process. The returning board had to shuffle and deal the cards over. Twenty-nine conservative majority tied the hands of that doubtfully elected governor; it gave the people some assurances of peace, liberty, and freedom from bankrupting taxation, and very likely secured the State in future to the conservative or democratic party. Here lies the great, the unpardonable sin, as I will more fully show after a while.

The law provides that the returning board shall consist of five persons, to be chosen from all political parties. In this case there were five, but each one of them was a republican in politics. Before they concluded their labors one of the number (General Longstreet) resigned; a conservative was chosen to fill the vacancy, who also resigned before the conclusion of their work, because of the determination of the board to go into secret session; this left but four, a number in law that had no power and could do no lawful act; yet they did act; they acted in secret session; they received testimony in that secret session that was never heard of while in open session. They changed that twenty-nine conservative majority and gave to each political party fifty-three members, leaving five cases undisposed of, but to be determined on by the Legislature when convened, hoping and believing, no doubt, to be able by changing one of the conservatives, who, to use the language of the sub-committee, was not a "staying democrat," to thereby secure a republican majority.

The election laws of Louisiana provide for a supervisor of registration, who appoints his own deputies for each ward in New Orleans, and for a supervisor of registration for each parish in the State; but the sub-committee tell us that the doubtfully elected governor took the trouble upon himself to appoint each one of these officers in positive violation of law. Yet he must be maintained in office because he got possession of it first.

Again, the law provides:

In case of violence, intimidation, or corruption at or near either poll, either during registration or election, as prevented a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote, the commissioners of election, if the occurrence was on election day, the supervisors of registration, if on the day of registration, should make a full, verified statement of the occurrence, and forward the same with and annexed to the returns; and that when the returning board in canvassing the returns should come to any polls where they were accompanied by such a protest, they should not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll until the statement from all other polls had been canvassed and compiled.

This law, too, was willfully violated by the returning board, there being some few polls protested against. The board did canvass, count, and compile these polls thus protested against in violation of the law, and their counsel attempts to shield them from this crime by asserting that the law is impracticable. I will not inquire into this now; but whether it was or not, it was a matter of law, and was or should have been binding upon every citizen of the State, whether he was an officer or a private citizen, and no man or set of men should be permitted willfully to violate the plain letter and spirit of law with impunity. These, though, are loyal officers, not to law, but to the powers that be; and because here and there a citizen becomes outraged in his feelings for these violations of his right and says or does some rash or imprudent act from the impulse of the moment, he is to be declared a bandit, an outlaw, and shot down under sentence of a drum-head court-martial like a beast.

The President says:

If a mob or a body of unauthorized persons seize and hold the legislative hall in a tumultuous and riotous manner, and to prevent any organization by those legally returned as elected, it might become the duty of the State executive to interpose, if requested by a majority of the members-elect, to suppress the disturbance and enable the persons elected to organize the house.

No such case existed. No mob had assembled or had seized and held the hall of representatives in the case before him. His case is an extreme one, not likely ever to exist.

Take the case as it is and you have, as before stated, the Legislature composed of one hundred and eleven members, with a conservative majority of twenty-nine until it reaches the returning board, who cut it down to an even vote of fifty-three each, the credentials of the remaining five not being acted upon at all. How could this be done? Why, by going into secret session as they did and there admitting affidavits that were never before heard of, though both political parties had their employed attorneys representing their respective cases before the board and up to its going into secret session. To show more conclusively and perhaps more satisfactorily the fraudulent purposes and acts of this board, I will here read from the report of this House committee, on page 3 of their report:

The parish of Rapides chose three members of the Legislature; the returns elected all three conservatives. When the proofs closed, the only paper filed with the returning board was the affidavit of the United States supervisor that the election was in all respects full, fair, and free. It was not known in the parish that any contest existed against these members. They left their homes and proceeded to New Orleans to be present at the opening of the Legislature, no intimation of contesting their seats or objection to their election having been given by their opponents. At one of their last sessions the returning board declared all the republican members elected from that parish. When the papers of the returning board were produced before your committee there was found among them an affidavit by Mr. Wells, the president of the board, declaring that intimidation had existed at certain polls in that parish, and that the returns from those polls should therefore be rejected. The counsel for the democratic committee testified that they had had no opportunity to contradict the statements of this paper; that they never had seen or known of it before, and that upon an examination of the papers before the board when the proofs closed it was not among them. The counsel for the republican committee reserved the right to make explanation upon this point, but offered none. The affidavit was dated the —— day of December, 1874. It appeared that Governor Wells was not himself in the parish on the day of the election, and though at the opening of their first session your committee declared their intention to examine into the action of the returning board, Governor Wells never came forward as a witness. At the close of our proceedings leave was asked that his deposition might be given in. This was declined, and Mr. Wells was himself invited to appear before the committee; but he never came. Leave was also given for taking his testimony by commission if he desired, but was not availed of.

Your committee are therefore constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, in rejecting these returns in the parish of Rapides, and giving the seats for that parish to the republican candidates, was arbitrary, unfair, and without warrant of law.

The committee say when the proofs closed the only paper filed with the returning board was the affidavit of a United States supervisor, stating that the election was in all respects full, fair, and free. Therefore no officer or other person protested against the election; there was no fraud or intimidation used or attempted to be used to procure the election of the three conservatives; indeed, the election was so fair and peaceable that it was not known in the parish that their seats were contested. Admitting the truth of this report, as every member must, can a more gigantic fraud than the ejection of these three members and the supplying their places with three republicans exist? Yet these three conservatives constituted a part of the mob that was dispersed by the military. This Mr. Wells, yes, Governor Wells, seems to have occupied a conspicuous position in this glaring and unblushing fraud. He was the chairman of the returning board, and swore that intimidation had existed at certain polls in the parish; this after they had gone into secret session; and at the same time it further appears that he was not in the parish on the day of the election. What a shameful commentary upon the justice with which elections are carried on and justice administered down there! Opportunity after opportunity and various modes were given this honorable chairman to make explanation of this most extraordinary affidavit, but he declined them all.

And strange as it may appear, upon this man's statement the President in part attempts to justify the interference of the military in dispersing the Legislature of Louisiana. Among the documents accompanying the President's message is found the following appeal from this honorable chairman:

[Telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, December 10, 1874.

President GRANT,
Washington, D. C.:

I transmit the following dispatch by request of ex-Governor Wells, president of the returning board.

WM. P. KELLOGG.

NEW ORLEANS, December 10, 1874.

President GRANT:

Authentic information in possession of the returning board justifies them in believing that an attack is intended upon the Saint Louis Hotel, now occupied as a State-house, wherein the returning board holds its sessions, and where the returns of the late elections are deposited. The board has nearly completed a careful and impartial canvass of the returns, in compliance with law, and expect to make promulgations therefrom as soon as the same can be properly compiled. The members of the board are being publicly and privately threatened with violence, and an attack upon the State-house, which is likely to result in bloodshed, is also threatened. By request of the board, I respectfully ask that a detachment of troops be stationed in the State-house, so that the deliberations and final action of the board may be free from intimidation and violence.

J. MADISON WELLS,
President of State Returning Board.

Judging from the report of our committee, as to his course and conduct, I am wholly unable to believe one word he may say of the situation in New Orleans.

The vote of poll No. 1 in the parish of Iberia is no better or clearer of the basest fraud on the part of this returning board. The committee say that this poll had been rejected on account of intimidation, but that the papers produced by the clerk of the board showed no such thing. They say one of the counsel for the republicans produced some affidavits tending to show intimidation, when the opposite counsel denied that any such affidavits had ever been before the board. The republican counsel thereupon attempted to prove they had, but in the opinion of the committee proved the reverse. Being defeated in this piece of villainous strategy, it is asserted that this poll was rejected because it was not returned to the supervisor of registration within the time prescribed by law; when the truth is this officer, from the report of the committee, had purposely kept himself out of the way on the day fixed by law when they should have been returned; and when offered to him on the next day he refused them, but did receive others, which were republican, on the same day and after he had refused to receive the conservative poll.

In the parishes of De Soto, Winn, and Terre Bonne the fraud is no less clear, palpable, and criminal. Here, sir, are six conservative representatives, each of whom has been grossly, willfully, and deliberately swindled out of his seat and a republican seated in his stead, and these frauds are this day being upheld and maintained by the Army of the United States. If you intend to disregard the will of the people and all State laws, and are determined by Federal interference to manage and control State elections, let me beg of you to have the honest thing done. Send a commission of honest men down there and let them examine and determine fully and fairly who is entitled to seats; and then, as you did when the States adopted their constitutions after reconstruction, require them to vote on all measures as you may dictate—by all means, if oppressively, let it be conducted honestly. Let it not go down to history and to posterity that men through the instrumentality of the Federal Government have been held and maintained in high places of honor and trust in violation of constitutional law. I know no language with which to denounce the action of that returning board as it deserves and at the same time maintain a decent respect for this House.

But the military interference is to be excused upon the ground that if it had not done so probably violence would have resulted, may be bloodshed and life lost. Ay, sir, what State in this Union, the blood of whose every citizen would not boil within him under similar circumstances? I would, and do now beg that people to bear everything with patience and Christian fortitude that may come upon them for the sake of peace; hoping, as I do, that the day is not far distant when they may be as free as their former slaves now are.

This House will remember that but a few days ago a scene more turbulent and violent occurred in the proud old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania than ever occurred in the State of Louisiana, yet no military was sent there, no Federal interference in that instance; and well there was not, for every man, woman, and child would have been in arms in the defense of their local self-control.

But Louisiana must submit to the indignity of having her Legislature dispersed by the soldiery of the Government without a murmur, and none to plead her cause, upon the application of a man who claims to be governor, though the election was a gigantic fraud at which he claims to have been elected. He got possession of the office though, and therefore has a better right to it than has his opponent! Nor is this all. His right to the office was adjudged by a Federal judge to be better than his competitor. Yes, sir; a Federal judge, whose drunken midnight order has covered him with obloquy and shame that will haunt him to his grave, and forever blot the fair fame of the American judiciary.

Not satisfied with the prostration and humiliation of Louisiana, but poor Arkansas must soon undergo the same trials and oppressions and forbearance unless Congress shall pass some law or do some act to protect her governor. On the 8th of January the President sent to the other end of the Capitol the following message:

To the Senate of the United States:

Herewith I have the honor to send, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant, all the information in my possession not heretofore furnished, relating to affairs in the State of Arkansas.

I will venture to express the opinion that all the testimony shows that in the election of 1872 Joseph Brooks was lawfully elected governor of that State; that he has been unlawfully deprived of the possession of his office since that time; that in 1874 the constitution of the State was by violence, intimidation, and revolutionary proceedings overthrown, and a new constitution adopted and a new State government established.

These proceedings, if permitted to stand, practically ignore all rights of minorities in all the States. Also, what is there to prevent each of the States recently readmitted to Federal relations on certain conditions changing their constitutions and violating their pledges, if this action in Arkansas is acquiesced in?

I respectfully submit whether a precedent so dangerous to the stability of State government, if not of the National Government also, should be recognized by Congress. I earnestly ask that Congress will take definite action in this matter to relieve the Executive from acting upon questions which should be decided by the legislative branch of the Government.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1875.

What does all this mean? What has come over the spirit of the President's dreams? Not a year ago he by proclamation recognized Baxter as the governor of that State, now he ventures to express the opinion that Brooks was elected. Well, for one I am willing to wait for the facts. But I beg pardon for this digression.

In conclusion I have to say, that in point of right I care not whether Wiltz was elected speaker of the Louisiana Legislature by the forms of law or parliamentary rules; it was a matter to be determined wholly by the members of the Legislature, and no other party or power on earth had any lawful right to interfere either peaceably or by force.

Take your Army away from these people, that they may once more feel that they are freemen, and as in the States of Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina, peace will follow. Their paralyzed energy and industry will spring into new life, their wasting untilled fields will bloom again with abundant and luxuriant harvests, their naked and starving families of pure women and innocent children will be made happy and bless you. They will fill your depleted and depleting Treasury with their sugar, rice, and cotton; your commerce will revive, hard times will pass away, and prosperity bloom out all over the land. You will not be required to increase your internal taxation upon the home industries of the country, nor your impost duties. Until you do this, my word for it, you will have no more general peace and prosperity in this once happy country.

Treaty Relations with China.

SPEECH OF HON. HORACE F. PAGE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House being as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PAGE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Near the close of the last session of Congress, in a few remarks I had the pleasure to submit to the House upon the question of Chinese immigration and cooly labor and their effects upon the laboring classes, especially of the Pacific coast, I endeavored to impress upon the House the importance of some action by Congress that would remedy this great evil. And now, sir, in connection with my remarks made at that time, I desire to present evidence of the facts relating to that subject; to read statements made and sworn to by citizens of the highest and most irreproachable character; to bring before you the universal sentiment of the people of California as expressed in the platforms of all political parties, in the resolutions of the State Legislature and the message of Governor Booth, and in the petitions to this House of more than seventeen thousand laboring men in my State, who through their representatives are to-day earnestly appealing to you to be relieved from the dreadful scourge. And I also desire to call the attention of the House to the views of eminent jurists touching the power of Congress to afford such relief; and I trust, sir, that I may be able to dispel all doubts, if any have existed, either as to the character and extent of the mischief or the power and duty of Congress to remedy it.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the statement of Ira M. Condit.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Ira M. Condit, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is an American citizen, forty-one years of age, and a regularly ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church. That he went to Canton, China, as a missionary in the year 1860, and resided there in that capacity for nearly six years; that he studied the Chinese language and learned to speak and understand the same; that in the course of his work as a missionary among the Chinese he became well acquainted with their habits and customs; and he knows of his own knowledge that it is a very common practice among them to buy and sell young girls for purposes of prostitution, and that a regular trade is carried on for this purpose. That deponent came to San Francisco in June, 1870, and took charge of a Presbyterian mission in the Chinese quarter, and ever since has been a resident of this city and engaged in that work; that he has striven to inform himself of the condition and character of the Chinese people living here, and knows of his own knowledge that there are men in the Chinese quarter who are engaged in the regular business of trafficking in women whom they purchase in China, bring to this country, and sell to houses of prostitution or place in houses of their own of the same character. Deponent knows of instances where they have been sold or exchanged for money or used to pay off a debt. These women are thus transferred from owner to owner like so many cattle, and valued according to age and appearance. They are kept in strict subjection, and retained in this slavery by menaces and even force. There have been repeated instances where they have escaped from their masters and sought refuge in one of the missions which have been established in the Chinese quarter. But it is very difficult for these women to escape, because their masters threaten to take the life of any person who shall assist them to get away. There are from two to three thousand Chinese women in this city, and certainly nine-tenths of them are prostitutes and have been brought from China for that purpose. The business of dealing in them has become very profitable, and a society known as the Hip Yee Tong Society, has been organized to protect and aid those who are engaged in it. All the different houses pay a certain sum to this society, which undertakes therefor to assist them in importing the women and in keeping them under subjection here and in preventing their escape.

Many of the better class of Chinese merchants are strongly opposed to this whole business, and are conscious of the disgrace which it brings upon their nation, and have on one or two occasions tried to prevent the further importation of lewd women, but without success.

IRA M. CONDIT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of October, 1874.

[L. S.] JOHN HAMILL, Notary Public.

Mr. PAGE. I now ask the Clerk to read the statement of Rev. Otis Gibson.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Rev. Otis Gibson, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I am a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church; was born in the State of New York in 1827; graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, in 1854. Went to Foo Chow, China, as a missionary in 1855, and remained in the field till 1865, when I returned to the State of New York. In 1868 I was appointed missionary to the Chinese on the Pacific coast, and have ever since resided in San Francisco, and have had charge of the Methodist Episcopal Chinese mission in this city.

I have had considerable experience among the Chinese people, both in China and in this country. Have some knowledge of the written language, and also of the spoken dialects of Foo-Chow and Canton.

In California my whole time and labor are expended upon and among the Chinese.

According to a general estimate there are about twenty thousand Chinamen in this city, about twenty-five hundred of whom are women or girls. A very large proportion of these females are enslaved prostitutes. It is my belief, founded upon personal observation and examination into the matter, that of all the Chinese females in San Francisco there are not more than three hundred who are really claimed as wives by the Chinese themselves, and nearly all of these are only secondary wives or concubines, in accordance with the custom of China. Of really first wives I do not think there are fifty in all the Chinese population of this city.

The importation of females from China for sale or rental is a regular and lucrative branch of business with a certain class of Chinese. About thirty of these women, at different times, have sought refuge from forced sales and from personal abuse in the mission asylum for Chinese women. A few of them on coming to the asylum brought with them the original bill of sale, of which the accompanying red paper in Chinese characters is a bona fide specimen. The translation, made by myself, is attached. The said red paper and translation is attached hereto, marked Exhibit A, and made a part hereof.

The process of buying and selling, as I have learned from various sources, from Chinamen and Chinawomen, and from these original bills of sale, is as follows: The trader, generally using some old woman as agent, purchases the girls in China for prices varying from thirty to two hundred dollars, pays the outfit, passage, &c., to San Francisco. Then the girl is sold to the highest bidder, she having no choice. In executing the bill of sale an effort is made to evade the American law against buying and selling human beings, the paper usually stating that the girl (to be sold) is indebted to her master or mistress so many hundred dollars (the sum for which she is to be sold) and that now ——— advances the money to the girl to enable her to pay this indebtedness; for which kindness on the part of ——— the girl agrees to prostitute her body for his benefit, for so long a time and on such and such terms.

The paper being executed and signed, the money is paid by the purchaser into the hands of the girl-victim, and she immediately passes it into the hands of her mistress, while she (the girl) is at the same time transferred to ———. A copy of this red paper bill of sale is given to the girl at the time, but as she cannot read she soon loses it, or it is taken from her, or just before her time expires a new charge of indebtedness is brought against her and she is resold; and this process is continued as long as the woman is marketable.

A powerful society exists in this city well organized called "Heip Yee Tong," (the temple of united justice,) which stands ready to aid these slave dealers in any difficulty that may arise, and no Chinaman who values his life would dare to expose the deeds of cruelty transacted by the agents of that society.

That Exhibit B, attached hereto and made a part of this sworn statement, is the record of the arrest and conviction of Mee Yung, a Chinawoman who was convicted on precisely this same charge in the police court of San Francisco.

EXHIBIT A.

An agreement-paper by the person Mee Yung.

At this time there is a prostitute woman, Yut Kum, who has borrowed from Mee Yung $470. It is distinctly understood that there shall be no interest charged on the money and no wages paid for services. Yut Kum consents to prostitute her body to receive company to aid Mee Yung for the full time of four years. When the time is fully served, neither service nor money shall be longer required.

If Yut Kum should be sick fifteen days she shall make up one month. If she conceives, she shall serve one year more. If during the time any man wishes to redeem her body, she shall make satisfactory arrangements with the mistress, Mee Yung. If Yut Kum should herself escape and be recovered, then her time shall never expire. Should the mistress become very wealthy and return to China with glory, then Yut Kum shall fulfill her time, serving another person.

This is a distinct agreement made face to face, both parties willingly consenting. But lest the words of the mouth should be without proof, this agreement-paper is executed and placed in her hands for proof. There are four great sicknesses against which Mee Yung is secured for one hundred days, namely, leprosy, epilepsy, conception, and "stone-woman," i. e., inability to have carnal intercourse with men. For any of these four diseases she may be returned within one hundred days.

Truly with her own hands Mee Yung hands over $470.

Tung Chee 12th year, 8th month, 14th day. This agreement is executed by Mee Yung.

The foregoing is a correct translation of the original bill of sale of the girl Yut Kum. Name given in the complaint, Gun Yoke.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

Personally appears before me this 22d day of May, A. D. 1874, Frank Spiller, who on oath makes complaint and deposes and says that on the 12th day of August, A. D. 1873, and from that day continuously until the 21st day of May, 1874, in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, the crime of misdemeanor was committed, to wit, by Mee Yung, (whose real name is unknown to this complainant,) who then and there, on account of certain money by the said accused pretended to be due to her from Gun Yoke, whose real name is unknown to deponent, did then and there, willfully and unlawfully solicit, persuade, and induce a certain person, to wit, said Gun Yoke, to be and remain in a state of servitude, and did then and there unlawfully attempt to hold and did hold the person of a certain human being, to wit, said Gun Yoke, and unlawfully claim the services of said Gun Yoke and unlawfully claim the possession of said Gun Yoke, and all without authority of law, thereby violating the provisions of section 1, order No. 1120 of the board of supervisors of said city and county of San Francisco; all of which is contrary to the force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided and against the peace and dignity of the people of the State of California. And this complainant, upon oath, accuses the said Mee Yung of having committed the said crime, and this complainant further alleges and deposes that the said accused was then and there arrested therefor in the actual commission of said offense, and prays that the said accused may be brought before a magistrate and dealt with according to law.

Mr. PAGE. In addition to these, I offer the statement of Mr. E. Z. Simmons, which the Clerk will please read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco, ss:

E. Z. Simmons, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says: I am an American citizen, of the age of twenty-seven years, and for the past six months a resident of the city of San Francisco. I am a missionary. In December, 1870, I left San Francisco for China as such missionary and as a representative of the Southern Baptist convention. I remained at Canton, in China, in the capacity of a missionary for over three years. I speak the Chinese language, and made it a part of my duty to study the habits and customs of that people.

I know it is a regular trade or business there to buy young girls before they attain their growth, and when nearly or quite grown to sell them for purposes of prostitution. I also know that most of the Chinese women who are brought to San Francisco come here for the purposes of prostitution, and they are brought here as the slaves or property of individuals, firms, and companies, and sold here to other Chinese as chattels. At least nine-tenths of all female Chinese now in California are of that class of persons, brought here for that purpose, and treated as slaves. Chinese women never organize houses of prostitution. The men do this, and then fill the houses with these unfortunate characters.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
San Francisco, California, December 21, 1874.

DEAR SIR: The steamer Great Republic arrived here on the 19th instant from Hong Kong with five hundred Chinese passengers; thirty-one were females; twenty were upon examination decided to be prostitutes. In the face of the late decisions of the various courts of this State and of the United States I am powerless to prevent their landing. I therefore deem it proper to inform you that the importation of that class of people still continues, and hope that Congress will without delay pass suitable laws to prevent their coming to this country. I notice your efforts in trying to abolish a traffic which is demoralizing to the people of this State. It is well known that every city and town in this State has Chinese brothels in such numbers as to spread disease to the young and inexperienced of our population.

Since my appointment as commissioner of immigration I caused the present State laws to be framed and passed by the Legislature of this State in the hope of especially preventing that class of people coming to our State, and inasmuch as the law has been declared inapplicable to the case, I have the satisfaction of knowing I have been the means of calling the attention of the people to the great evil, and thereby remedying the defect by your prompt action in the introduction of a suitable law.

I have fought the case to its present position, and shall not cease until the Supreme Court of the United States shall have passed upon the right of a State to protect itself against a moral pestilence of such great magnitude.

I have all the testimony published on the trial before the courts, also the various decisions of our judges and courts. If you deem them of any importance to you in matter, I will with pleasure forward the same to you without delay. I would esteem it a favor if you would send me copies of the laws introduced relative to Chinese immigration.

Wishing you every success in your endeavor to advance the interests of the people of this State, I remain

Your obedient servant,

R. KORWIN PIOTROWSKI,
Commissioner of Immigration.

Hon. H. F. PAGE, M. C.

Mr. PAGE. There, sir, is the testimony. It is from the mouths of pure men, and is in all respects incontrovertible. It is eloquent of the truth. And what a spectacle does it present in a nation that boasts its civilization, its enlightenment, its Christianity!

Upon this state of facts, sir, it is not strange that the people of California should be united in opinion and let no proper occasion pass without expressing it. In presenting their views to the House, I offer first a resolution adopted by the republican convention of California, June 28, 1871, as follows:

That the presence in our midst of large numbers of Chinese who are incapable of assimilation with our races, ignorant of the nature and forms of our government, and who manifest no disposition to acquire a knowledge of the same, or to conform to our habits, manners, or customs, is a serious and continuous injury to the best interests of the State; that their employment under the plea of cheap wages is offensive to the exalted American idea of the dignity of labor, detrimental to the happiness and prosperity of our laboring classes, and an evil that ought to be abated. That while we unsparingly reprobate and denounce all acts of violence wheresoever and by whomsoever committed upon them, we are inflexibly opposed to their admission to citizenship, and demand of the Federal Government the adoption of such treaty regulations and legislation as shall discourage their future immigration to our shores.

The democracy of California, in their convention held June 29, 1869, expressed their views upon this subject, as follows:

That the democracy of California believe that the labor of our white population should not be brought into competition with the labor of a class of inferior people, whose living costs comparatively nothing, and who add nothing to the wealth of our churches, schools, societies, and social and political institutions.

Upon the subject of Chinese immigration Governor Newton Booth, in his first biennial message to the Legislature of California, December, 1873, says:

The increased volume of Chinese immigration in the past year has excited unusual attention. Those who are so far removed from us as to form their opinions on this subject from general principles rather than from special facts, and many persons here who are not brought in competition with Chinese labor, but are benefited by its cheapness, have often indulged in harsh criticisms upon the prevailing sentiment of this State in regard to Chinese immigration. Upon this subject I beg to repeat substantially what I have before said. The Chinese immigration constitutes a marked class, a distinctive element of society. We cannot be blind to the fact that China, with a population of more than three hundred millions, is as near to us practically as New York, and may send here such a volume of immigration as would modify our society and substantially change the relations of capital to labor. That modification would not be such as we desire in American civilization; that change would not be in the interest of free labor. The labor of the Chinese who come here is cheap, because in the mass they have no families to support, no children to educate, and are free from the wants which differentiate our civilization from theirs; and in order to compete with them in price, other laborers would be compelled to reduce themselves to the same conditions.

Besides these considerations, the presence of a large population in our midst, to whom we are unwilling to accord equality of political rights, establishes, to that extent, a system of caste, and is at variance with the genius of our institutions.

I believe the general sentiment of the people of the State will concur in the view that while the Chinese who are here, or who may come under the stipulations of our treaty, should be protected from violence and persecution, the General Government should call for such a readjustment of the treaty as will restrain their further immigration.

And now, sir, as bearing upon the question of the power of the State to exclude these people from its limits and to prevent their landing, on account of the immorality of their lives, I desire to call your attention to the opinion of Mr. Justice Field, delivered September 24, 1874, in the case of Ah Fong, a Chinese woman, brought before the circuit court of the United States for the district of California on a writ of habeas corpus.

The court, among other things, takes the ground that the extent of the power of the State to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right of self-defense. Whatever outside of the legitimate exercise of this right affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein, is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the General Government, and is not subject to State control or interference.

That the sixth article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the 28th of July, 1868, provides that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and as the General Government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress into the United States of subjects of those nations, none can be applied to the subjects of China.

I read from the decision:

The petitioner alleges that she is illegally restrained of her liberty by the coroner of the city and county of San Francisco, and asks to be discharged from such restraint. The facts of the case, as detailed in the proceedings before us, are briefly as follows: The petitioner is a subject of the empire of China, and came to the port of San Francisco as a passenger on board of the American steamship Japan, owned by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and under the command, as master, of J. H. Freeman. On the arrival of the steamship at this port, which was on the 24th of August last, she was boarded by the commissioner of immigration of California, who proceeded under the provisions of the statute of the State to examine into the character of the petitioner and other alien passengers. Upon such examination the commissioner found, and so declared, that the petitioner and twenty-one other persons, also subjects of the empire of China, arriving as passengers by the same steamship, were lewd and debauched women. He thereupon prohibited the master of the steamship from landing the women unless he or the owner or consignee of the vessel gave the bonds required by the statute. Neither of the parties designated would consent to give the required bonds, and the women were consequently detained by the master on board of the steamship. They thereupon applied for a writ of habeas corpus to a district court of the State to inquire into the cause of their detention, alleging in their petition its illegality on the ground that the statute under which they were held was in contravention of the treaty between the United States and the empire of China and in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and denying also that they were either lewd or debauched women. The district court granted the application and heard the petitioners, and after the hearing remanded them back to the charge of the master of the steamship, holding that the statute of California was neither in violation of the treaty or the Constitution, and that the evidence presented justified the finding of the commissioner that the petitioners were lewd and debauched women. The petitioners thereupon applied to the chief justice of the State for another writ of habeas corpus, alleging the illegality of their restraint on grounds similar to those taken in the petition to the district court, and also alleging that they were, since the order of the district court remanding them to the custody of the master of the steamship, about to be forcibly returned to China against their will and consent. They therefore prayed that with the writ of habeas corpus a warrant might issue to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to take them into his custody.

The chief justice granted the writ, returnable before the supreme court of the State, and at the same time issued a warrant commanding the coroner of the city and county to take the parties into his custody and bring them before the court.

Under this warrant the parties were taken into the custody of the coroner, and in his custody they still remain. The supreme court sustained the ruling of the district court, and denied the application of the parties to be discharged, holding that the statute of the State under which they were detained was valid and binding under the treaty between the United States and China and the Constitution of the United States, and that the evidence justified the finding of the commissioner of immigration as to the character of the women.

It therefore made an order directing that the coroner return the parties to the master or owner or consignee of the steamship Japan, on board of the steamship, and requiring such master, owner, or consignee to retain the parties on board of the steamship until she should leave this port, and then to carry them beyond the State.

The order further provided that in case the steamship Japan was not in the port of San Francisco, the coroner should retain the parties in his possession until the arrival in port of the steamship, and then enforce the order returning the parties to the vessel or retain the parties until the further direction of the court.

The petitioner is one of the women thus held by the coroner, and she now invokes the aid of this court to be released from her restraint, alleging as in the other application that the restraint is illegal; that the statute which is supposed to authorize it is in contravention of the treaty with China and the Constitution of the United States, and averring that she is not within either of the classes designated in the statute. It further appears from the special traverse to the return of the coroner, and it is admitted by counsel, that since the judgment of the Supreme Court the steamship Japan has sailed from the port of San Francisco, and will not probably return under three months, and that Freeman has been discharged from the service of the steamship company and is no longer master of the Japan.

The statute of the State under which the petitioner was restrained of her liberty on board of the steamship is found in the provisions of chapter 1, title 7, of the political code as amended by the last Legislature. The provisions require the master of a vessel arriving at any port of this State, bringing passengers from any place out of the State, within twenty-four hours after its arrival, to make a written report under oath to the commissioner of immigration at such port, stating, among other things, the name, place of birth, last residence, age, and occupation of all passengers who are not citizens, and whether any of the passengers thus reported "are lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled, or infirm, and not accompanied by any relatives able to support them, or are lewd or abandoned women."

Then follow the special provisions which have given rise to the present proceeding. They are contained in section 2952 of the code as amended. They require the commissioner of immigation "to satisfy himself whether or not any passenger who shall arrive in this State by vessels from any foreign port or place (who is not a citizen of the United States) is lunatic, idiotic, deaf, dumb, blind, crippled, or infirm, and is not accompanied by relatives who are able and willing to support him, or is likely to become permanently a public charge, or has been a pauper in any other country, or is, from sickness or disease, existing either at the time of sailing from the port of departure or at the time of his arrival in this State a public charge, or likely to become so, or is a convicted criminal, or a lewd or debauched woman;" and they declare that "no person who shall belong to either class, or who possesses any of the infirmities or vices specified herein, shall be permitted to land in this State unless the master, owner, or consignee of said vessel shall give a joint and several bond to the people of the State of California, in the penal sum of $500 in gold coin of the United States, conditioned to indemnify and save harmless every county, city, and town of this State against all costs and expenses which may be by them necessarily incurred for the relief, support, medical care, or any expense whatever resulting from the infirmities or vices herein referred to of the persons named in said bonds within two years from the date of said bonds; and if the master, owner, or consignee of said vessel shall fail or refuse to execute the bond herein required to be executed, they are required to retain such persons on board of said vessel until said vessel shall leave the port, and then convey said passengers from this State; and if said master, owner, or consignee shall fail or refuse to perform the duty and service last herein enjoined, or shall permit said passengers to escape from said vessel and land in this State, they shall forfeit to the State the sum of $500 in gold coin of the United States for each passenger so escaped, to be recovered by suit at law."

It is undoubtedly true that the police power of the State extends to all matters relating to the internal government of the State and the administration of its laws, which have not been surrendered to the General Government, and embraces regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, peace, and safety of society. Under this power all sorts of restrictions and burdens may be imposed having for their object the advancement of the welfare of the people of the State; and when these are not in conflict with established principles or any constitutional prohibition, their validity cannot be questioned. It is equally true that the police power of the State may be exercised by precautionary measures against the increase of crime or pauperism or the spread of infectious diseases from persons coming from other countries; that the State may entirely exclude convicts, lepers, and persons afflicted with incurable disease; may refuse admission to paupers, idiots, and lunatics and others who from physical causes are likely to become a charge upon the public until security is afforded that they will not become such a charge, and may isolate the temporarily diseased until the danger of contagion is gone. The legality of precautionary measures of this kind has never been doubted. The right of the State in this respect has its foundation, as observed by Mr. Justice Grier in the Passenger cases, in the sacred law of self-defense, which no power granted to Congress can restrain or annul.

But the extent of the power of the State to exclude a foreigner from its territory is limited by the right in which it has its origin, the right of self-defense. Whatever outside of the legitimate exercise of this right affects the intercourse of foreigners with our people, their immigration to this country and residence therein are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the General Government, and not subject to State control or interference. To that Government the treaty-making power is confided; also the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which includes intercourse with them as well as traffic; also, the power to prescribe the conditions of migration or importation of persons, and rules of naturalization; whilst the States are forbidden to enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation with other nations.

I am aware that the right of the State to exclude from its limits any persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens has been asserted by eminent judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Chief Justice Taney maintained the existence of this right in his dissenting opinion in the Passenger cases, and asserted that the power had been recognized in previous decisions of the court. The language of the opinion in the case of The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Peters, 141, would seem to sustain the doctrine. But neither in the Passenger cases nor in the case of The City of New York vs. Miln did the decision of the court require any consideration of the power of exclusion which the State possessed, and all that was said by the eminent judges in those cases upon that subject was argumentative, and not necessary and authoritative.

It is evident that if the possible violation of the laws of the State by an emigrant, or the supposed immorality of his past life or profession, where that immorality has not already resulted in a conviction for a felony, is to determine his right to land and to reside in the State, or to pass through into other and interior States, a door will be opened to all sorts of oppression. The doctrine now asserted by counsel for the commissioner of immigration, if maintained, would certainly be invoked, and at no distant day, when other parties, besides low and despised Chinese women, are the subjects of its application and would then be seen to be a grievous departure from principle.

I am aware of the very general feeling prevailing in this State against the Chinese, and in opposition to the extension of any encouragement to their immigration hither. It is felt that the dissimilarity in physical characteristics, in language, in manners, religion, and habits, will always prevent any possible assimilation of them with our people. Admitting that there is ground for this feeling, it does not justify any legislation for their exclusion, which might not be adopted against the inhabitants of the most favored nations of the Caucasian race and of Christian faith. If their further immigration is to be stopped, recourse must be had to the Federal Government, where the whole power over this subject lies. The State cannot exclude them arbitrarily, nor accomplish the same end by attributing to them a possible violation of its municipal laws. It is certainly desirable that all lewdness, especially when it takes the form of prostitution, should be suppressed, and that the most stringent measures to accomplish that end should be adopted.

By the fifth article of the treaty between the United States and China, adopted on the 28th of July, 1868, the United States and the Emperor of China recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to another, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

The sixth article declares that citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and reciprocally that Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

The only limitation upon the free ingress into the United States and egress from them of subjects of China, is the limitation which is applied to citizens or subjects of the most favored nation! And as the General Government has not seen fit to attach any limitation to the ingress of subjects of those nations, none can be applied to the subjects of China. And the power of exclusion by the State, as we have already said, extends only to convicts, lepers, and persons incurably diseased, and to paupers and persons who, from physical causes, are likely to become a public charge. The detention of the petitioner is therefore unlawful under the treaty.

But there is another view of this case equally conclusive for the discharge of the petitioner, which is founded upon the legislation of Congress since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. That amendment in its first section designates who are citizens of the United States, and then declares that no State shall make or enforce any law which abridges their privileges and immunities. It also enacts that no State shall deprive any person (dropping the distinctive designation of citizens) of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. The great fundamental rights of all citizens are thus secured against any State deprivation, and all persons, whether native or foreign, high or low, are, while within the jurisdiction of the United States, entitled to the equal protection of the laws. Discriminating and partial legislation favoring particular persons or against particular persons of the same class is now prohibited. Equality of privilege is the constitutional right of all citizens, and equality of protection is the constitutional right of all persons. And equality of protection not only implies equal accessibility to the courts for the prevention or redress of wrongs and the enforcement of rights, but equal exemption with others of the same class from all charges and burdens of every kind.

Within these limits the power of the State exists, as it did previously to the adoption of the amendment, over all matters of internal police, and within these limits the act of Congress of May 31, 1870, restricts the action of the State with respect to foreigners immigrating to our country. "No tax or charge," says the act, "shall be imposed or enforced by any State upon any person immigrating thereto from a foreign country which is not equally imposed or enforced upon every person immigrating to such State from any other foreign country; and any law of any State in conflict with this provision is hereby declared null and void." (16 Statutes at Large, 144.)

It appears by the opinion just read that the Legislature of California have attempted to deal with this subject. That they have passed acts which have been adjudicated by the State courts. But finally, in the opinion of the Federal courts, we find that the State Legislature has no power over the subject, and that it is entirely within the control of Congress.

Congress has recognized its right to legislate upon this subject. By an act approved February 19, 1862, entitled "An act to prohibit the coolie trade by American citizens in American vessels," it was made unlawful for any citizen of the United States or foreigner coming into or residing within the same, for himself or any other person, either as master, factor, or owner of any ship or vessel registered or enrolled or licensed in the United States or any port within the same, for the purpose of procuring from China or from any port or place therein any subjects of China known as coolies to be transported to any foreign country, port, or place whatever, to be disposed of, sold, or transferred for any term of years, or for any time whatever, as servants or apprentices, or to be held to service or labor, and that any person violating the provisions of this act, said vessel or steamship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any of the district or circuit courts of the United States, and that any person or persons aiding or abetting therein shall be severally liable to be indicted therefor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $2,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year.

The sixth section of this act provides:

That the President of the United States shall be, and he is thereby, authorized and empowered, in such way and at such time as he shall judge proper to the end that the provisions of the act may be enforced according to the true intent and meaning thereof, to direct and order the vessels of the United States and the masters and commanders thereof to examine all vessels navigated or owned in whole or part by citizens of the United States, and registered, enrolled, or licensed under the laws of the United States, wherever they may be, whenever in the judgment of such master or commanding officer thereof reasonable cause shall exist to believe that such vessel has on board, in violation of the provisions of this act, any subjects of China known as "coolies" for the purpose of transportation; and upon sufficient proof that such vessel is employed in violation of the provisions of the act, to cause such vessel to be carried, with her officers and crew, into any port or district within the United States and be delivered to the marshal of such district to be held and disposed of according to the provisions of this act. (12 Statutes at Large, 340.)

Our relations with China are regulated by the treaty of June 18, 1858, with the supplemental or additional articles of 1868. In regard to emigration of citizens and subjects from one country to the other, the fifth additional article to the treaty between the United States and China, July 28, 1868, (Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 740,) provides that—

The high contracting parties, therefore, join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent.

Sir, I again refer you to the facts, and ask whether China enforced these stipulations? Has she acted in good faith? It may be urged that her subjects come here under a voluntary contract; that her women voluntarily sell themselves into slavery. Can one person induce another to voluntarily do an unlawful act without bringing both within the penalties of the violated law? If this be true, which I very much doubt, then they are doubly guilty. For they add to the crime of prostitution that of voluntary slavery, both of which the Chinese Empire permits its subjects to commit in violation of the laws of our country and in open defiance of the treaty.

The testimony produced abundantly shows that the Chinese nation have violated their treaty stipulations with us, and that the exigency has plainly arisen in which Congress may exercise whatever powers it may possess. As to what those powers are, I read from the opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis in the case of Sanford vs. Scott, 19 Howard's Reports, 629:

By a treaty with a foreign nation the United States may rightfully stipulate that the Congress will or will not exercise its legislative power in some particular manner on some particular subject. Such promises when made should be voluntarily kept with the most scrupulous good faith. But that a treaty with a foreign nation can deprive the Congress of any part of the legislative power conferred by the people so that it no longer can legislate as it was empowered by the Constitution to do, I more than doubt.

The powers of the Government do and must remain unimpaired. The responsibility of the Government to a foreign nation for the exercise of those powers, is quite another matter. That responsibility is to be met and justified to the foreign nation according to the requirements of the rules of public law; but never upon the assumption that the United States had parted with or restricted any power of acting according to its own free will governed solely by its own appreciation of duty.

The second section of the sixth article is: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." This has made treaties part of our municipal law; but it has not assigned to them any particular degree of authority, nor declared that laws so enacted shall be irrepealable. No supremacy is assigned to treaties over acts of Congress. That they are not perpetual, and must be in some way repealable, all will agree.

If the President and the Senate alone possess the power to repeal or modify a law found in a treaty, inasmuch as they can change or abrogate one treaty only by making another inconsistent with the first, the Government of the United States could not act at all, to that effect, without the consent of some foreign government. I do not consider, I am not aware it has ever been considered, that the Constitution has placed our country in this helpless condition. The action of Congress in repealing the treaties with France by the act of July 7, 1798, (1 Statutes at Large, 578,) was in conformity with these views. In the case of Taylor et al. vs. Morton, 2 Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, 454, I had occasion to consider this subject, and I adhere to the views there expressed.

I now beg leave to present the petition of the laboring men of my State. It is signed by seventeen thousand as true and loyal citizens as ever petitioned the representatives of a free people or supplicated the throne of Grace:

To the honorable the President and Senate of the United States:

The petition of the undersigned citizens resident in the State of California respectfully shows—

That your petitioners view with just alarm the systematic importation and immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States to be employed at rates of wages ruinous to the free labor of our citizens.

That the vast sums granted by Congress in bonds and public lands to aid in the construction of transcontinental railways, are perverted to the employment of this debased Asiatic labor, while thousands of our own citizens in all parts of the Republic are destitute of work.

That your petitioners cannot regard such a misdirection of the revenues collected from the industry of the people but as a flagrant abuse of the objects contemplated in these munificent grants of the national resources.

That in all future measures of congressional aid provision should be embodied against such abuse, and that supplementary legislation to this end should be provided in the exercise of existing grants.

That our recent history shows with what devotion to the great principles of freedom our citizens placed their lives at the command of the Government and poured out their blood and treasure to terminate the blighting influence of slavery in our midst. Yet an equally and, if possible, a more insidious danger must eventuate by the great increase of this servile population.

That this immigration is in no manner homogeneous with us as a people; that their social wants, habits, and character differ so materially that the standard of labor must be debased to such a degree by their vitiating influence as to repel vast bodies of our most valuable operatives, and not only degrade the social status and moral welfare of our producing classes but arrest the advancement of our civilization.

That the Asiatic has displaced to a great extent the citizen operatives formerly engaged in the various manufactures of the city of San Francisco, and is rapidly displacing others.

That all occupations giving profitable employment to both male and female have suffered through this cause.

That the aggregate diminution of wages to American citizens cannot be less than $9,000,000 annually.

That the expenditure of such vast industrial resources, thus withdrawn from circulation, has entailed privation among the working classes, taxed the most generous benevolence, and operated most detrimentally against the prosperity of the city.

That there are fifty thousand Chinese now in California, whose average net gain is estimated at fifty cents per day—$25,000—and at least $7,500,000 per annum, all of which is shipped to China, for they are and intend to remain strangers in our midst, and it is the fixed policy of the government of China that they shall so remain. This great and increasing drain on California is one of the causes of the great depreciation in property and stagnation of business in our State.

That the spread and augmentation of the number throughout the State of California has seriously discouraged the increase of the most desirable class of European immigrants, such additions to our industrial population seeking homes where labor is less degraded, or in greater demand.

That your petitioners would urge upon your honorable consideration the necessity of an immediate revision of our treaty relations with China to restrain this overwhelming evil.

That all treaty stipulations should be based on the principle of reciprocal advantages, not mutual privileges. The right or privilege for a citizen of the United States to migrate to China, and for a subject of China to migrate to the United States are not mutual in advantages, for it is an advantage to the subject while it is disadvantageous to the citizen to migrate. Hence, such provison in the treaty is impolitic and unwise.

That the inundation of incompatiable races into the various avenues of labor, which are still so inadequate to supply employment to our own producing classes, must evidently lead to the most disastrous consequences.

That your petitioners are actuated by no illiberal feeling inimical to the less advanced races. On the contrary, it is their earnest desire that all the offices of friendly intercourse should be generously fulfilled; that religious instruction and the advantages of scientific education should be placed at their command; that instead of permitting the unchristian sordidness of our own race using them to degrade the social condition of our people and to desecrate the noblest hopes of our national destiny, we should render them every service to elevate their civilization.

That a cause which projects and accelerates the concentration of wealth and thus erects in the very bosom of the nation a power destructive of republican institutions, as evidenced by every record of history, and which draws into conflict the millions whose sole dependence and property consist in labor, and therefore sacred to the interests of their families, impeaches equally the justice and wisdom of such a policy.

That we are but in the first stages of this fatal policy.

That its destructive influence on the industrial condition of California is the inevitable result which must follow its extension into every other State of the Union.

That it may now be arrested by the foresight and sagacity essential to the guardianship of a great nation, while the delay or neglect of necessary measures will leave the growing antagonism of interests to gather force and ultimately consolidate its power in resistance to the most salutary legislation.

That your petitioners earnestly hope that your honorable body, pre-eminent under the Constitution in its deliberative functions, will not disregard their prayer nor underrate the solemn importance of a subject so grave.

That large numbers of our most valuable operatives have withdrawn from this degrading competition while others are preparing to abandon a State where a beneficent Providence has spread such immeasurable blessings over its fair valleys. This assuredly demonstrates how limited is governmental knowledge in the administration of divine bounty, and how much the prosperity of a nation depends on the wisdom of its statesmen.

The complaint herein set forth by your petitioners is most respectfully submitted to your honorable consideration.

I hope, sir, that these petitioners may be heard. For more than a year past the laborers of the country have been and are to-day suffering for want of employment, with what results let the last few months bear witness. But it is believed that their sufferings are only temporary, and that with the restoration of the finances they will again find something to do. Not so, however, with the petitioners should Chinese immigration continue. They have no refuge. Their destruction will be as hopeless as it is certain.

I am aware that the sentiment of the country, attracted by the tinsel and glitter of wealth, is fast growing inimical to the laboring classes. That sentiment is fed and inflamed here. Enormous subsidies are granted. Great corporations, monstrous moneyed monopolies, are built up, which are utterly absorbed in the desire for gain. The power already envelops the land. Their minions swarm everywhere. They knock and clamor at the doors of the Capitol, impeding and perverting the legislation of the country. And amid their confusion the peaceful, patient, and earnest demands of free labor, like the voices of the night, grow fainter and fainter, and I believe the time is fast approaching when they will be entirely hushed within these walls; when the pampered sons of wealth, unmindful of honest, toiling manhood, will alone occupy seats upon this floor. The signs of the times point unerringly to this result. The excessive and daily increasing expense of living at the national capital, the grand displays made here by the millionaire, his princely style of living, his magnificent establishments and gorgeous entertainments, and, above all, the homage that wealth everywhere receives, admonishes those of moderate means how futile will be their attempts to gain place, position, or power here.

Sir, I make no apology for what I say in behalf of the workingmen of the country. Sprung myself directly from the loins of toil, associated with it from the earliest moment of my life until the present time, bound up in it by the endearing tie of a parent who at the very summit of life tills the soil that gives him bread, it will not be wondered that I make their cause my own.

But the prayer of the petitioners especially commends itself to you. It is the appeal not only of the tried bone and sinew, but of the best blood and highest courage. The petitioners are largely composed of the early emigrants to California and their children. They were allured thence by your promise of the public domain. It is true it was a glittering prize, but they must traverse hundreds and thousands of miles of unsettled, wild, and dangerous country to reach it. You offered them no convoy of safety. Your laws afforded them no protection. Yet these stout-hearted people, gathering up all they had, with their wives and children, staked everything upon the venture. The way was perilous. The arid, inhospitable, and apparently boundless plain, strewn with the bleaching bones of their fellows gone before, wild beasts howling upon their track and hostile savages confronting them, warned them of danger and death in every form. But nothing daunted by the perils of the desert, or beast, or savage, they pressed bravely on to the end. Their destination saw them commence life anew. They began again upon the bed-rock of human existence. Their means spent or lost, they had no resort except the labor of their hands, and to that they betook themselves. In their new home your laws barely shawdowed, they did not protect them. They were compelled to protect themselves. Yet amid all these adverse circumstances they neither murmured nor complained, but worked hopefully, cheerfully on, and made a home for themselves and their children. They have established and maintained that relation to capital which gives happiness, contentment, and prosperity to all. From anarchy and confusion they have wrought out a well-ordered and exemplary society and poured untold millions of treasure into your coffers. Their patience and industry, wisdom and virtue, entitle them to the highest rank of honor; for they are not only the founders, but also the builders of a most magnificent State. And now while their voice may yet be heard on this floor they appeal to you for protection. This deadly blight seems to have marked them out for destruction on this the day which should be sacred to their triumph. It is true they ask it for the frugal meal and humble cot, but it is asked in the name of that elevated, dignified, and ennobled labor which is the bulwark of American liberty. Will you withhold it? I charge you, no.

And again, sir, if the hope of the Republic lies in the virtue of its youth, protect that virtue.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in what has been heretofore and now said, I have attempted to place before the House the incalculable evils of Chinese immigration; to show its alarming extent; its withering effects on the morals of society; its degrading and destructive influence on American labor; the decided and unequivocal views of the people of California condemning it; and the decisions of the courts, showing that the State is unable to protect itself, and that in Congress alone lies the power to remedy it.

But why dwell longer upon a subject so disgusting, so revolting, that it must shock the moral sensibilities of every one who has listened to or will read the evidence submitted to the House to-day? I hope, sir, that it will have the effect to place a dividing line between vice and virtue; that it will send the brazen harlot who openly flaunts her wickedness in the faces of our wives and daughters back to her native country, and teach these traffickers in human beings that in this land of ours, where virtue is respected and honest toil appreciated, we will no longer submit to their infamous practices. That while we are willing to put forth a helping hand, we insist that a common respect for our Government demands of China, if she insists on sending here none but the lowest and most depraved of her subjects, that they shall obey our laws, and have a decent respect for our customs and the rules of society. We have long enough been her cess-pool.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I leave this question with the House, believing that justice, sometimes slow but sure, will be done, and that the cause of these complaints will be removed, and in its place will be heard the grateful acclamations of a long-suffering people; and that then, through the Golden Gate and across the continent, will come a race of people to settle among us who will plant the vine, cultivate the soil, and add something to the substantial wealth of the country. And then from the north, where Mount Shasta rears her snowy peaks; to the south, where the orange tree perpetually blooms; from the east, where the Sierra Nevadas, clad in their priestly robes, stand sentinel to guard our homes; to the west, where the amber waters of the Pacific lave her golden sands, a half million people with one acclaim will hail the day of their deliverance.

Senator from Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN S. HAGER,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 17, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections by Mr. MORTON on the 8th instant:

"Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th of March, 1873"—

Mr. HAGER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is with great hesitation and reluctance that I rise to address the Senate at this late hour at night after this prolonged sitting, upon a question that has been so ably and so thoroughly discussed by others who have preceded me. The subject, however, with all its correlative issues, is of paramount importance, and one that is entitled to our serious and I may say melancholy reflection. It relates to events of greater significance and magnitude, next to the firing upon Fort Sumter, than any that have occurred in the history of our Government since the formation of the Federal Constitution.

Although the pending resolution relates to the admission of a Senator from the State of Louisiana, it is understood the whole subject relating to Louisiana affairs is before the Senate. I shall therefore not confine myself strictly to this resolution, but will speak generally upon the so-called Louisiana case. When the news first reached us of the invasion of a sovereign State, of the investment of its State-house, of the forcible ejection of persons, claiming to be elected members, from the legislative chamber, and finally of the organization of one branch of the Legislature by the Army of the United States, there was a spontaneous outburst of indignation from one end of the Union to the other. Why has this marked interest been manifested in this Hall among the people and by the press throughout the entire country? Not because it is a mere question of party politics, but because it involves great questions appertaining to constitutional liberty and our republican form of government.

I am glad that this interest has been manifested. It indicates that there is yet a spirit in the land not dead to the calls of liberty and country; that sentiments of patriotism yet predominate over all considerations of party. I have observed too, sir, with gratification the calm and temperate discussion of the independent and in many instances of the party press. So long as the weight and power of the press is true and devoted to the country, there is yet hope for the country, whether it be amid the calamities of civil war or whether it be amid usurpations in times of peace. We have had rebellion in hot blood against the flag in the open field, and we have had and now have a more dangerous rebellion in cold blood against the Constitution. One was war, open war, and was met and overthrown by war; the other, more insidious and more inexcusable, can only be overthrown by the slow process of public opinion, often too slow to arrest the danger. That public opinion will yet accomplish it, I have no doubt, for in this enlightened age no sovereign is so ensconsed behind his battlements but what that public opinion will make itself heard, and no President, and no Congress, and no party is so enshrouded in the panoply of power but what it will make itself felt.

Mr. President, who stands to-day before the American people as responsible for the events that have occurred in Louisiana which have so convulsed the country? Not the President of the United States, for, as we must infer from his late message, he disclaims them as having been done by his knowledge or authority; not the General of the Army, for he was not consulted and had no part or lot in the matter; not the major-general in command of the Southern Division, including Louisiana, for the order went not through him; not the Congress, for Congress has not declared war against the sovereign State of Louisiana. Who then is responsible? All that we know is that the Army with General Sheridan, sent secretly with sealed instructions, in command, executed and the Secretary of War "and all of us," as he telegraphed to Sheridan, approved. That is all the information as to authority that we have. Who gave the orders? Who invested Kellogg with the authority to direct the movements of the Army of the United States? Whoever he may be, let it be avowed before the American people and let the responsibility rest where it properly belongs. Be the responsibility where it may, it must be sustained and justified by law, or it must be denounced as a usurpation.

It will not do for Senators to shirk or blink the true issue by telling us that murders have been committed and lawlessness prevails in Louisiana, and that there have been unlawful combinations for political or other purposes. The public mind is not to be thus diverted. If any principle of the Constitution has been violated, does it follow as a logical sequence, as we must infer from the remarks of some Senators, that it may be justified by the recitals of crimes and murders committed in that State. A thousand homicides, murders, if you will, will not justify unlawful assaults upon the life of the nation. No injustice to the living, white or black, can excuse or justify usurpation or violation of the Constitution.

About a year ago it was my privilege to be honored by taking a seat in this Chamber. This Louisiana case, in one of its phases, was then pending before the Senate upon the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, made February 20, 1873, which has been so often referred to and quoted from—it was the business of this Committee to inquire substantially as to the form of government that was existing in Louisiana. That report during the progress of this debate I for the first time have read and made myself to some extent familiar with. Although it be a thrice-told tale, as has been said, it unfolds a story that cannot be too often repeated. I believe, sir, that it discloses the first fatal error; the first great departure in government; the foundation, the origin of the evils the fruits of which we are reaping this day; and at the risk of being tedious I desire to refer not extensively but briefly, chronologically rather than in detail, to certain portions of that report.

In 1872, on the 4th of November, under the laws and constitution of the State, an election took place in Louisiana. The administration of that State, the governor and all the officers, so far as I know, were republican. It was a republican administration of the State government. Warmoth, elected as a republican and at the time, I believe, acting with the republican party, was governor; and the election was entirely under the control of persons acting with and claiming to be of that party. After it took place an extra session of the Legislature was called by Governor Warmoth to meet on the 9th day of December. Between the issuance of the call for the meeting of the Legislature and the day on which it was to assemble important events transpired in Louisiana, as contained in this report of the committee and to which I will briefly refer in chronological order.

On December 3 was the dispatch which has been read so often of the Attorney-General:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

I find no predicate for this dispatch in the report of the committee. I am unable to determine why the Attorney-General should have sent this dispatch to the officer to inform him that he was to do that which the law required him to do. It was the duty of the marshal, as I understand it, to enforce all lawful decrees and mandates of the United States courts whenever conveyed to him in l gal form. I can only infer that it was in anticipation of some unusual, some extraordinary events that were about to ensue.

December 5 following December 3, almost as soon as the dispatch could reach Louisiana, Captain Jackson, of the United States Artillery, arrived in New Orleans at two o'clock at night with two batteries of artillery.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the State-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal, and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testifies that he was not stationed in the State-house to prevent riots, but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered.

Who gave this order does not appear by the records or by anything that is disclosed in this report. Why was it so timely, connected with this dispatch, that an officer of the Army went at night with two batteries of artillery? That same night, December 5, Judge Durell issued his void order to Marshal Packard to take possession of the State-house, as follows:

Now, therefore, in order to prevent the further obstruction of the proceedings in this cause, and, further, to prevent a violation of the order of this court, to the imminent danger of disturbing the public peace, it is hereby ordered that the marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana shall forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute, and occupied as the State-house for the assembling of the Legislature therein, in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court, and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblage therein under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said pretended returning officers in contempt and violation of said restraining order; but the marshal is directed to allow the ingress and egress to and from the public offices in said building of persons entitled to the same.

E. H. DURELL.

I will simply in this connection read what the committee say in regard to that order. The order, which is pronounced by the committee to be a void order, made by Judge Durell is spoken of by the committee thus:

It is impossible to conceive of a more irregular, illegal, and in every way inexcusable act on the part of a judge. Conceding the power of the court to make such an order, the judge out of court had no more authority to make it than had the marshal. It has not even the form of judicial process. It was not sealed, nor was it signed by the clerk, and had no more legal effect than an order issued by any private citizen.

That was an order that under the telegram of the Attorney-General the marshal was bound to execute in case he obeyed his superior officer I suppose. This order issued as I say on December 5. On December 6, Captain Jackson took possession of the State-house about two o'clock in the morning. On December 6, the same day, Durell's injunction to restrain the action of the legal canvassing board was issued, which is quoted in this report at page 24, and is as follows:

Injunction.—Issued December 6, 1872.

Circuit court of the United States, fifth circuit and district of Louisiana.

WM. PITT KELLOGG vs.
HENRY C. WARMOTH, JACK WHARTON, FRANK H. HATCH, DURANT Da Ponte, John McEnery, and The New Orleans Republican Printing Company. } No. 6830.

The President of the United States, greeting:

Whereas it has been represented to us in our said circuit court on the part of William P. Kellogg, by his bill of complaint lately exhibited against you and each of you, touching certain matters and things therein set forth:

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of the allegations in said bill contained, you, the said above-named defendants, your attorneys, and each of you, are hereby commanded and strictly enjoined under the penalty of the law that you absolutely refrain and desist during the pendency of this cause, until the further order of this court, from in any manner, either directly or indirectly, considering or pretending to consider or canvass any statement, certificate, or return of any supervisor or assistant supervisor of registration, or any officer having any duties to perform about or concerning an election held on the 4th day of November, 1872, in the State of Louisiana, or relating to any votes or ballots cast at said election, except in the presence of John Lynch, Jacob Hawkins, James Longstreet, and George E. Bovee, a board of returning officers for said election, or from submitting or allowing to be submitted, or from aiding or assisting in the submission to the said defendants, Frank H. Hatch, Jack Wharton, Durant Da Ponte, or any other person or persons whatsoever, other than the said Hawkins, Bovee, Lynch, and Longstreet, any paper, document, affidavit, statement of votes, return of officers of election, or other proof in any manner relating to said election, and from allowing any other person or persons whatsoever, other than those in this order excepted, whether pretending to act as returning officers or in any other capacity, to inspect, consider, have access to, canvass, or tamper with any paper, document, affidavit, statement of votes, return, or written proof relating to said election, or to the fairness and correctness thereof, that may have heretofore or may hereafter come into his hands or possession, and which by law should properly be laid before, submitted to, or considered by such returning officers of election in making a canvass thereof; and that the said defendant, H. C. Warmoth, be further enjoined and inhibited from altering, suppressing, mutilating, destroying, or secreting any such document, proof, or paper.

And that he further desist and be enjoined from in any manner interfering with, obstructing, or hindering the said Lynch, Longstreet, Bovee, and Hawkins, or either of them, from full and complete access to, as well as custody of, such documents, proof, or paper.

And that he further desist and be enjoined from in any manner interferring with, obstructing, or hindering the said Lynch, Longstreet, Bovee, and Hawkins, or either of them, from full and complete access to, as well as custody of, such documents, papers, and proofs relating to said election as he may or shall have in his possession, custody, or control, or as they shall or may demand, either by refusing to deliver such documents or proofs to them, or either of them, or by any suit or proceeding instituted with the intent to hinder, delay, or obstruct them in the performance of their duty as returning officers; and that he be further restrained and enjoined from issuing any commissions to any persons based upon any calculation, deduction, or pretended canvass of ballots cast at said election, or make, publish, sign, or deposit in the office of the secretary of state, or in any other public office, or cause to be so deposited, any document, statement of persons elected to any offices or positions of trust at said election, and from giving any effect to the same if already filed and deposited, unless the same be with the concurrent action and lawfully given consent of the said Lynch, Hawkins, Bovee, and Longstreet, or a majority thereof, or of a sufficient number of them to constitute a majority of a board of returning officers.

And it is further ordered that the said defendants, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, Durant Da Ponte, and the New Orleans Republican Printing Company, until the final hearing of this cause, or until the further order of the court, be severally and respectively enjoined and restrained to the same extent, effect, and manner as said complainant has in his bill of complaint prayed they may severally and respectively be restrained.

And that writs of injunction in due form of law issue against the said defendants in accordance with the terms of this order.

And that the restraining order heretofore issued and allowed in this cause continue in full force and effect until the court shall otherwise order.

Witness the Honorable Salmon P. Chase, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at the city of New Orleans, this 6th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1872.

[SEAL.] F. A. WOOLFLEY, Clerk.

Upon this order to restrain the canvassing board and upon the action of this judge and his decrees and what followed the regularity of the proceedings in setting up a government for Louisiana depends, and what say the committee in regard to this order? On page 17 of the report we read as follows:

Viewed in any light in which your committee can consider them, the orders and injunctions made and granted by Judge Durell in this cause are most reprehensible, erroneous in point of law, and are wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and your committee must express their sorrow and humiliation that a judge of the United States should have proceeded in such flagrant disregard of his duty, and have so far overstepped the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

No words of mine are necessary to give force to this opinion of the committee.

On December 6, the same day, the Lynch board pretended to have canvassed the returns. We will see what the committee say in regard to that:

On the 6th of December, 1872, the Lynch board—Bovee, (who was then acting as secretary of state in place of Herron,) Lynch, Longstreet, and Hawkins—pretended to have canvassed the returns of the election, and certified to the secretary of state that Kellogg had been elected governor; Antoine, lieutenant-governor; Clinton, auditor; Field, attorney-general; Brown, superintendent of education; and Deslondes, secretary of state; and also certified a list of persons whom they had determined to be elected to the Legislature.

There is nothing in all the comedy of blunders and frauds under consideration more indefensible than the pretended canvass of this board.

The following are some of the objections to the validity of their proceedings:

1. The board had been abolished by the act of November 20.

2. The board was under valid and existing injunctions restraining it from acting at all, and an injunction in the Armstead case restraining it from making any canvass not based upon the official returns of the election.

3. Conceding the board was in existence, and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.

The returns from the parishes had been made, under the law of 1870, to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board.

It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself, who participated in this canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican legislature, and made their canvass to that end. The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns, in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements, and in other cases where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits, and delivered them to the Lynch board, while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case; for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

Further on we read as follows:

But for the interference of Judge Durell in the matter of this State election, a matter wholly beyond his jurisdiction, the McEnery government would to-day have been the de facto government of the State. Judge Durell interposed the Army of the United States between the people of Louisiana and the only government which has the semblance of regularity, and the result of this has been to establish the Kellogg government, so far as that State now has any government. For the United States to interfere in a State election, and by the employment of troops set up a governor and Legislature without a shadow of right, and then to refuse redress of the wrong upon the ground that to grant relief would be interfering with the rights of the State, is a proposition difficult to utter with a grave countenance.

This is the language of the committee, and upon the acts here enumerated hinges the legality of the election and of the organization of the Legislature in Louisiana which elected Mr. Pinchback, the applicant for a seat in the Senate. The persons declared elected by this Lynch board, as set forth by the report of this committee, have been the State officers and the Legislature of Louisiana for the past two years, sustained as they have been by the Army of the United States. Now although we have the act of Congress of May 31, 1870, still in force, as follows:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person shall be defeated or deprived of his election to any office, except elector of President or Vice-President, Representative or Delegate in Congress, or member of a State Legislature, by reason of the denial to any citizen or citizens who shall offer to vote, of the right to vote, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—and further providing that such person may have his right of action in the Federal courts; yet in express violation of its provisions, in the case of Antoine, lieutenant-governor, vs. Warmoth, Judge Durell issued his restraining order to prevent the organization of the senate and house of representatives except as he indicated in his orders, and in his orders he enumerated by names the persons that might convene and the persons who should not convene as members of the Legislature of Louisiana, and made that a part of his restraining order. I will omit this restraining order on account of its length and merely read what the committee say in regard to it. The opinion of the committee is on page 43 of the report and is as follows:

Here was a restraining order, having the force of an injunction, issued for no purpose under heaven except to control the organization of the Legislature and compel the seating of those members who had been returned and certified to by the Lynch board, and exclude those who had been certified to by the De Feriet board.

When we consider that the act of Congress under which this proceeding was instituted by express words excludes members of the State Legislature from the right to maintain any proceedings in a Federal court to obtain their seats, even when they have been defeated and deprived of their rights, because citizens have been denied the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and that the State-house was held by Federal troops under the unlawful and void order of Judge Durell, hereinbefore set forth, which order commanded the marshal to prevent "all unlawful assemblage therein under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said De Feriet board," we can comprehend the full force and effect of the additional restraining order in the Antoine case.

* * * * * * *

Indeed, it is impossible not to see that this bill was filed, and the restraining order thereon was issued, for the sole purpose of accomplishing, what no Federal court has the jurisdiction to do, the organization of a State Legislature.

And your committee cannot refrain from expressing their astonishment that any judge of the United States should thus unwarrantably have interfered with a State government, and know no language too strong to express their condemnation of such a proceeding.

I do not think that any language I could use would be stronger in condemnation of the action of the judge in pronouncing that decree than the committee use themselves.

While these proceedings were progressing before Judge Durell let us look at the moving power behind the throne. We find while they were in progress in Louisiana the United States marshal was telegraphing to the Attorney-General of the United States, and the collector of the port (Casey) was telegraphing to the President. The correspondence is here recorded. I will present these telegrams to the Senate without remark in the order of their dates, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 6, 1872.

President GRANT:

Marshal Packard took possession of State-house this morning at an early hour, with military posse, in obedience to a mandate of circuit court, to prevent illegal assemblage of persons under guise of authority of Warmoth's returning board, in violation of injunction of circuit court. Decree of court just rendered declares Warmoth's returning board illegal, and orders the returns of the election to be forthwith placed before the legal board. This board will probably soon declare the result of the election of officers of State and Legislature, which will meet in State-house with protection of court. The decree was sweeping in its provisions, and if enforced will save the republican majority, and give Louisiana a republican Legislature and State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpations. Warmoth's democratic supporters are becoming disgusted with him, and charging that his usurpations are ruining their cause.

JAS. F. CASEY.

NEW ORLEANS, December 6, 1872.

Attorney-General WILLIAMS,
Washington, D. C.:

Returning board provided by election of seventy, under which election was held, and which United States court sustains, promulgated in official journal this morning result of election of Legislature. House stands seventy-seven republicans, thirty-two democratic; senate twenty-eight republicans, eight democratic. Board counted ballots attached to affidavits of colored persons wrongfully prevented from voting, filed with chief supervisor.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington D. C.:

Returning board has officially promulgated in official journal this morning the result of the election for State officers. Kellogg's majority 18,861.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

Governor Warmoth has been impeached by vote of 58 to 6. Warmoth's legislature returned by his board has made no pretense of a session.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

Senate, by vote of 17 to 5, have resolved into high court of impeachment. Senator Harris elected president of the Senate, Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback being now governor.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

Hon. GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.:

Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback qualified and took possession of the governor's office to-night. Senate organized as high court of impeachment, Chief Justice Ludeling presiding, and adjourned to meet Monday next. It is believed that all the democrats members of General Assembly will qualify and take seats to-morrow.

S. B. PACKARD,
United States Marshal.

Hitherto nothing appears to justify or warrant Federal interference in the local government in Louisiana. The President had not been called upon for Federal protection; but after the mischief had been done he was called upon to protect the creature called a government set up by Federal authority, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

We have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following concurrent resolution of both houses of the General Assembly and to request an early reply:

Whereas the General Assembly is now convened in compliance with the call of the governor, and certain evil-disposed persons are reported to be forming combinations to disturb the public peace, defy the lawful authority, and the State is threatened with violence: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the President of the United States be requested to afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States when threatened with domestic violence, and that the presiding officers of the General Assembly transmit this resolution immediately, by telegraph or otherwise, to the President of the United States.

Adopted in General Assembly convened this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, and President of the Senate.

CHAS. W. LOWELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Next in order we have—

NEW ORLEANS, December 9, 1872.

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in the possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly as conveyed in the concurrent resolution of this day telegraphed to you requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution, although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 11, 1872

Hon. GEORGE H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch. May I suggest that the commanding general be authorized to furnish troops upon my requisition upon him for the protection of the Legislature and the gubernatorial office? The moral effect would be great, and in my judgment tend greatly to allay any trouble likely to grow out of the recent inflammatory proclamation of Warmoth. I beg you to believe that I will act in all things with discretion.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor.

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Parties interested in the success of the democratic party, particularly the New Orleans Times, are making desperate efforts to array the people against us. Old citizens are dragooned into an opposition they do not feel, and pressure is hourly growing; our members are poor and adversaries are rich, and offers are made that are difficult for them to withstand. There is danger that they will break our quorum. The delay in placing troops at disposal of Governor Pinchback, in accordance with joint resolution of Monday, is disheartening our friends and cheering our enemies. If requisition of Legislature is complied with all difficulty will be dissipated, the party saved, and everything go on smoothly. If this is done, the tide will be turned at once in our favor. The real underlying sentiment is with us, if it can but be encouraged. Governor Pinchback acting with great discretion, as is the Legislature, and they will so continue.

JAS. F. CASEY.
Collector.

NEW ORLEANS, 11, 1872.

Hon. GEORGE WILLIAMS:

If President in some way indicate recognition, Governor Pinchback and Legislature would settle everything. Our friends here acting discreetly.

W. P. KELLOGG.

NEW ORLEANS, 11, 1872.

President GRANT:

Democratic members of Legislature taking their seats. Most, if not all, will so in next few days. Important that you immediately recognize Governor Pinchback's legislature in some manner, either by instructing General Emory to comply with any requisition by Governor Pinchback, under joint resolution of Legislature of Monday, or otherwise. This would quiet matters much. I earnestly urge this, and ask a reply.

JAMES F. CASEY.

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

President GRANT:

The condition of affairs is this: The United States circuit court has decided which is the legal board of canvassers. Upon the basis of that decision a Legislature has been organized in strict conformity with the laws of the State, Warmoth impeached, and thus Pinchback, as provided by the constitution, became acting governor. The chief justice of the supreme court organized the senate into a court of impeachment, and Associate Justice Taliaferro administered oath to Governor Pinchback. The Legislature, fully organized, has proceeded in regular routine of business since Monday. Notwithstanding this, Warmoth has organized a pretended Legislature, and it is proceeding with pretended legislation. A conflict between these two organizations may at any time occur. A conflict may occur at any hour, and in my opinion there is no safety for the legal government without the Federal troops are given in compliance with the requisition of the Legislature. The supreme court is known to be in sympathy with the republican State government. If a decided recognition of Governor Pinchback and the legal Legislature were made, in my judgment it would settle the whole matter. General Longstreet has been appointed by Governor Pinchback as adjutant-general of State militia.

JAMES F. CASEY.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Thus the fraud and usurpation were recognized by the Attorney-General.

Now for a moment we will refer to what the report discloses as to the other side representing the people and not the Federal officials:

NEW ORLEANS, December 11, 1872.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Under an order from the judge of the United States district court, investing James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and others with the powers and duties of returning officers under State election law, and charging them with the duty of completing the legal returns and declaring the result in accordance therewith, those persons have promulgated results based upon no returns whatever, and no evidence except ex parte statements. They have constructed a pretended General Assembly, composed mainly of candidates defeated at the election, and those candidates, protected by United States military forces, have taken possession of the State-house and have organized a pretended Legislature, which to-day has passed pretended articles of impeachment against the governor; in pursuance of which the person claiming to be a lieutenant-governor, but whose term had expired, proclaimed himself acting governor, broke into the executive office under the protection of United States soldiers, and took possession of the archives. In the mean time the General Assembly has met at the city hall, and organized for business with sixty members in the house and twenty-one in the senate, being more than a quorum of both bodies. I ask and believe that no violent action be taken, and no force used by the Government, at least until the supreme court shall have passed final judgment on the case. A full statement of the facts will be laid before you and the Congress in a few days.

H. C. WARMOTH.
Governor of Louisiana.

NEW ORLEANS, 12, 1872.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President United States:

Claiming to be governor-elect of this State, I beg you, in the name of all justice, to suspend recognition of either of the dual governments now in operation here until there can be laid before you all facts, and both sides, touching legitimacy of either government. The people denying the legitimacy of Pinchback government and its Legislature simply ask to be heard, through committee of many of our best citizens on eve of departure for Washington, before you recognize the one or the other of said governments. I do not believe we will be condemned before we are fully heard.

JNO. McENERY.

NEW ORLEANS, December 12, 1872.

SIR: As chairman of a committee of citizens appointed under authority of a mass-meeting recently held in this city, I am instructed to inform you that said committee is about leaving here for Washington to lay before you and the Congress of the United States the facts of the political difficulties at present existing in this State, and further earnestly to request you to delay executive action in the premises until after the arrival and hearing of said committee, which is composed of business and professional men, without regard to past political affiliations.

THOMAS A. ADAMS,
Chairman.

His Excellency U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States.

These appeals from Governor Warmoth and Governor-elect McEnery and from the citizens of Louisiana were spurned and treated with contempt, as the following will show:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 13, 1872.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Your visit with a hundred citizens will be unavailing so far as the President is concerned. His decision is made and will not be changed, and the sooner it is acquiesced in the sooner good order and peace will be restored.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Finally we have the following:

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1872.

General W. H. EMORY, U. S. A.,
Commanding New Orleans, Louisiana:

You may use all necessary force to preserve the peace, and will recognize the authority of Governor Pinchback.

By order of the President:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

And thus the government was established under the decrees made by Judge Durell, which by the committee are pronounced void and without authority of law, and this government has been maintained in place, and is all the government the people of Louisiana have had for two years past.

Now what does the committee say of these proceedings? I will read from the opinion of the majority, which is reported on page 44. The committee making the majority report were composed of Messrs. CARPENTER, LOGAN, ALCORN, and ANTHONY, still members of this body, all of the republican party, and I believe in good standing in that party, and is as follows:

OPINION OF MAJORITY OF COMMITTEE.

It is the opinion of your committee that but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board, and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell and the support given to him by United States troops, resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices, and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject, and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.

Your committee are therefore led to the conclusion that, if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the Legislature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State. Considering all the facts established before your committee, there seems no escape from the alternative that the McEnery government must be recognized by Congress or Congress must provide for a re-election.

Now, if this Senate should be disposed to follow the recommendation of the committee, the election of Mr. Pinchback must be declared illegal, for he was not elected by the legal Legislature, as certified by the De Feriet board, but by the Kellogg usurpation.

I will also read from the opinions of the minority Senator Trumbull's opinion on page 61. He says:

The history of the world does not furnish a more palpable instance of usurpation than that by which Pinchback was made governor, and the persons returned by the Lynch board the Legislature of Louisiana.

I also quote from Senator MORTON'S minority opinion, pages 76, 77:

The conduct of Judge Durell, sitting in the circuit court of the United States, cannot be justified or defended. He grossly exceeded his jurisdiction, and assumed the exercise of powers to which he could lay no claim. The only authority he had in the matter grew out of the act of Congress of 1870 to enforce the fifteenth amendment, and the act amendatory of that, passed in 1871, which gave to the courts of the United States jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under the former act. Under the first act two classes of cases might arise: first, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been illegally denied the right to vote upon the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and second, actions to enforce the rights of those who had been deprived of office by reason of the denial to persons of the right to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and suits in equity ancillary or in aid of these rights of action would come within the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States, among which would be a suit to perpetuate testimony. But the pretense that in a suit to perpetuate testimony the court could go beyond the natural and reasonable jurisdiction to decide who constituted the legal returning board under the laws of Louisiana, and to enforce the rights of such as it might determine to be members of that board and to enjoin others who were not, is without any foundation in law or logic.

In the Antoine case, Judge Durell not only assumed to determine who constituted the legal returning board, but to prescribe who should be permitted to take part in the organization of the Legislature and to enjoin all persons from taking part in such organization who were not returned by the Lynch board as elected; and this assumption of jurisdiction was made in the face of the express provision in the act of 1870 that its benefits should not extend to candidates for electors for Congress, or for the State Legislature. His order issued in the Kellogg case to the United States marshal to take possession of the State-house for the purpose of preventing unlawful assemblages, under which the marshal called to his aid a portion of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus can only be characterized as a gross usurpation.

Such is the opinion of Senator MORTON, who is still present here in the Chamber and also in good standing in the republican party.

Senator Hill substantially agreed with the majority except as to the proposed remedy. We thus have the unanimous opinion of the entire committee as to the usurpation of Judge Durell in promulgating his decrees which was the foundation upon which the government was constituted and the Legislature was organized. To the government and Legislature thus brought into existence the applicant for a seat in this Chamber is indebted for his election.

Thus stands the record among the archives of the Senate on the report of a committee which was instructed to inquire into the facts of this case. As I say they report that this government was established by the void decrees of this Federal judge sustained by the Army of the United States and the Attorney-General. It was a government that was conceived, according to my interpretation, in the telegram of the Attorney-General of December 3 and brought into being by a prearranged combination and interference by the Federal officials at New Orleans not native or to the manner born. Bovee testifies they "were determined to have a republican Legislature and made their canvass to that end." Casey telegraphs to the President:

Durell's decree is sweeping, and if enforced will save the republican party and give Louisiana a republican Legislature and State government.

A telegram of that character to the President of the country and of the whole country requires no comment. Casey calls on the President to recognize the government thus established and to sustain the action had by the Army; Packard calls on the Attorney-General for like purposes; and by both it is granted. The Army sustained and yet sustain the usurpation.

Sir, can despotism in the destruction or formation of governments go further than this? Yet these men are all in office, Casey, Packard, and the Attorney-General. A decent respect for the opinions of mankind required that Durell should abdicate, and a decent respect for the opinions of mankind required he should resign his office to escape impeachment. The Attorney-General not only remains in office, but has been nominated to the highest judicial position in the gift of the Government, no doubt the reward of merit. Durell is out of office—parties, like republics, are sometimes ungrateful—but perhaps he, too, is destined to be elevated or at least nominated to some more exalted position as his reward for valuable services rendered. And at some future day some eulogist of his party, equally gifted with those who have preceded me, will perhaps rise here in his place to pronounce his panegyric, and with like force and emphasis apply to him clarum et venerabile nomen.

For two years this State government, this usurpation, has remained in power, and the people of Louisiana have been without remedy here or elsewhere. For two years this record has remained before the Senate showing that Louisiana has been deprived of her sovereignty, yet not a voice of the dominant party has been raised here in her behalf. Perhaps I should except one, the Senator from Wisconsin not now in his place, [Mr. CARPENTER.] He offered a remedial measure, and supported it with an argument of great power and eloquence; but he might say to his compeers of the dominant party in this Chamber with Coriolanus:

Alone I did it.

And alone he stands as the only one of the dominant party upon this floor who has raised a voice in behalf of down-trodden Louisiana.

Sir, if the action of the Administration in Louisiana, unveiled as it is by this report, is to stand as a precedent unrebuked and without remedy; in Louisiana to-day, in Arkansas to-morrow; in State after State over the whole Union, and finally in the Congress itself, how long will it be before some one bolder than the rest, some American Maximinus or some American Napoleon, shall seize upon all, and concentrating all and consolidating all shall stamp his heel on all that we regard as sacred and valuable and in the place of our republican institutions establish an overshadowing despotism.

After every appeal to the Executive and to Congress for relief had failed, on the 14th of September last the people of Louisiana rose in their majesty and by force—say by revolution—drove the usurpers from place and installed those in office who they believed were elected by the people. Sir, I do not stand here to justify or condemn their act, or to draw refined ethical distinctions between usurpation and revolution. Our fathers rose in rebellion against Great Britain and proclaimed to the world that governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that when any form of government became destructive of certain ends enumerated, it was the duty of the people to alter and to abolish it. Perhaps, too, they remembered the injunction—

Who would be free themselves must strike the blow.

At all events it illustrated how weak was the creature called government set up by Federal power and the void decrees—I was going to say, of a corrupt judge—I will say of a pliant and degraded judge. It illustrated how strong were the people and how strong was public sentiment against that government. It was swept away like chaff before the whirlwind; it was the power of the majority against the minority, of the people against the usurpers, and it showed to the world how weak was the government thus set up as against that power. But again the Executive interfered, the Army was interposed, and again the people submitted and bowed their heads to Federal authority.

If it be true, as reported by the committee, that the government of 1872 was established by usurpation, will any Senator of the dominant party tell us how Louisiana is to regain her liberty, her autonomy, the control of her government? Do Kellogg and the Federal officers enjoy a perpetuity? Are they to remain in place forever? With the returning board under his control, with the Army at his command, how is Kellogg to be dislodged from power? Louisiana complains to-day for the usurpation of 1872, not of her own citizens, but of Federal officers, the collector, the marshal, the judge, the Attorney-General, and the Army of the United States, as the disturbers of her peace, the usurpers of her government, the oppressors of her people, and the plunderers of her citizens. As the committee say, if she had been left to herself the McEnery government would have been installed and the people would have acquiesced. They would then have had a majority and not a minority government. A government of the people and not a usurpation. Did not the Attorney-General know what would follow when he sent his telegram of December 3? Did he not know that the void decrees of Judge Durell would follow when he sent that telegram? Did not the Attorney-General know that the proceedings before Judge Durell were void, and that the government thereby established was a usurpation? If he did not he is unfit to hold the office he now occupies. Officers of the Army, as we are told, are not presumed to know much about law, but the same cannot be said of the head of the Department of Justice, and I presume he knew what the effect of these orders were. I presume when he was telegraphing responsively to communications from Packard and from Kellogg that he knew what had transpired, and that these void decrees were being enforced. Is not the President now fully advised in regard to this Kellogg government and how it has been inaugurated and maintained in place? In his late message, January 13, 1875, he says:

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result. Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion has more right to it than his competitor.

On the 20th of February, 1873, the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate made a report in which they say they were satisfied by testimony that the manipulation of the election machinery by Warmoth and others was equivalent to 20,000 votes; and they add that to recognize the McEnery government "would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of the State." Assuming the correctness of the statements in this report, (and they seem to have been generally accepted by the country,) the great crime in Louisiana, about which so much has been said, is that one is holding the office of governor who was cheated out of 20,000 votes against another whose title to the office is undoubtedly based on fraud and in defiance of the wishes and intentions of the voters of the State.

The President refers to the same report from which I have been so largely quoting.

Did he read all that report?

I regret that the President overlooked that portion of the report which I have read this evening—especially that on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth pages—of forged affidavits, and of the fraudulent manner in which the returns were gotten up. Those things are entirely omitted, also the conclusions of the committee; and yet the President says that there were frauds, as the committee say, to the extent of 20,000 votes. The majority of the committee also say that the McEnery government ought to have been installed in office, and would have been if the Government had not interfered, and that the people would have acquiesced in it as the rightful government.

The usurpation of 1872 is the first that has occurred in times of peace in the history of our country where a sovereign State has been invaded and a government set up by Federal and military power. It is without precedent, and the cases that have been referred to are not parallel with this; none but itself can be its parallel; and if it ever becomes the duty of some future Gibbon to write the history of our decline and fall, it will stand a memorable monument to guide the researches of the historian.

The events that have transpired since, in the last election in Louisiana, are the natural results of the usurpations to which I have referred, and the same instruments have been used for their accomplishment. In the election of 1874 there was the same manipulation of the returns, by the same set of men, the falsification of the vote by the returning board, and the voice of the people was again set aside. Kellogg again appears as the agent and manager, supported by Federal authority. I shall not attempt to recapitulate the history of this last election. I propose merely to speak of these events so far as they are national. The important question to my mind is, even if we admit the first election or the second election were void for fraud, can the President with the Army invade a State and set up a government? It must not be forgotten that the day the Legislature assembled the State-house was invested and under guard, and none were admitted except by Federal authority. The proceedings that took place have been detailed so often that it is hardly necessary to refer to them. Wiltz organized the house temporarily. He was elected as its speaker. He called upon De Trobriand to quell some disturbance that had taken place in the lobby. That is made use of here and by the President, in his late message, as a point against the democratic party. It is said in the message "the first call upon the military was made by the democrats." In such matters there should be neither democrats nor republicans. Wiltz as speaker did first call on De Trobriand. But it must not be forgotten the State-house was under guard of the United States Army, and that none were permitted to enter therein but by the permit of the guard. Even members of Congress, the committee of the House sent there to investigate and report, could not enter the State-house or the legislative chamber except by the permission of United States officers. There was, therefore, no one else to call upon but the United States military officer, who allowed them to enter and who had the control of the State-house at the time. The State authorities and police were displaced by the military, and had no power or authority to interfere.

Next De Trobriand, without being invited by the speaker, marched in with his sword by his side and his platoon of soldiers and marched out those persons who were there claiming to be elected by the people, and then he proceeded to organize that branch of the Legislature. Now, by what authority did he take possession of the State-house? By what authority did he remove persons claiming to be elected members, and by what authority did he proceed to organize that branch of the Legislature? It was a house of representatives de facto, all that Louisiana has had, all that the President has sustained in Louisiana for the past two years. It was peaceably assembled. At the time De Trobriand entered it was an organization effected and peaceable, and it was dissolved by military force. Can despotism go further than this? By what authority did the United States interfere with the Army? Who will explain? Whether or no the speaker was regularly elected, whether or not the yeas and nays were called, are questions for Louisiana and her authorities to decide, and not for the Federal Government. Whether it was a house de facto or a house de jure, who must decide? The rule must be the same in every State of the Union. The President or the Army has no more authority to organize or to interfere in the organization of the Legislature in Louisiana than in Pennsylvania, Indiana, or any other State of the Union.

Now, in regard to the pretext for Government interference in Louisiana, we have the report of the House committee, a committee that was sent there to investigate this very matter, composed of two members of the republican party and one Democrat. The report of that committee is a complete refutation of the allegations which have been made on this floor against the people of Louisiana, and in substance is as follows:

First. That there was no intimidation of negroes, but that there was intimidation of the white voters by Federal power.

Second. That the election was remarkable for its fairness.

Third. That the conservatives had a large majority.

Fourth. That the action of the returning board was unfair and illegal.

Fifth. The stories about oppression, &c., of the white-leaguers were fictions.

This report is the best evidence that we have, better than any mere rumor, better than any newspapers or telegrams that have been received and referred to, and the only quasi official evidence that has been brought before us. And it is corroborated and sustained by the clergy and the laity and the better class of the people of Louisiana generally.

If this organization thus effected by Wiltz had been an organization of the republican party, no De Trobriand and no Sheridan would have interfered. I put that on record before the American people, that no officer of the Army of the United States would have interfered with the organization had it been an organization effected in the same way by the republican party.

In regard to the subsequent acts of Sheridan, I have nothing to add to that which has been said by others. I have no desire to pluck one laurel from his brow. But if the report from the committee of the House be true, his dispatches in denunciation of the people of Louisiana are inexcusable, and will stand among the most infamous and despotic acts perpetrated in times of peace to be found recorded in our history, which the brightest page in his military career can never obliterate, which no ignorance of law can excuse, and humanity and decency will never forget. If I had been told that Sheridan's acts were intended to add insult to injury, to rekindle the dead embers of civil war and again plunge the South into scenes of blood and violence, I could understand it. If such was the design, it has most signally failed, and I am glad of it. I am glad that the people of Louisiana have submitted to usurpation and even indignity. Their forbearance has enlisted the sympathy of the people of the whole country, and will yet lead to their deliverance and emancipation.

Now, sir, I would ask, does any Senator pretend to deny the truth of the report made by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the government of Louisiana as organized in 1872 was brought into existence by the void decrees of Judge Durell, sustained by the Attorney-General and the Army of the United States, and that it was a usurpation? So far as I remember I cannot recall that one Senator has precisely placed himself upon that ground and made that denial here. Does any Senator pretend that there is any constitutional authority to justify the recent investment of the State-house of Louisiana and the forcible ejection from the legislative chamber of persons claiming to be members, and the organization of the house by the officers and military of the United States? So far as I know, not one. If in the Constitution there be any warrant or authority for the proceeding, let it be produced. The President does not pretend to justify it. I believe my colleague [Mr. SARGENT] did attempt to justify it to some extent, and to maintain that the President had such authority to interfere, but against his position I quote the Presdent himself. We must infer the President does not approve of the military interference in Louisiana. On page 5 of his late message of January 13, in reference to this matter, the President says:

Respecting the alleged interference by the military with the organization of the Legislature of Louisiana on the 4th instant, I have no knowledge or information which has not been received by me since that time and published. My first information was from the papers of the morning of the 5th of January. I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence. I am well aware that any military interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of the State Legislature or any of its proceedings, or with any civil department of the Government, is repugnant to our ideas of government. I can conceive of no case, not involving rebellion or insurrection, where such interference by authority of the General Government ought to be permitted or can be justified. But there are circumstances connected with the late legislative imbroglio in Louisiana which seem to exempt the military from any intentional wrong in that matter. Knowing that they had been placed in Louisiana to prevent domestic violence and aid in the enforcement of the State laws, the officers and troops of the United States may well have supposed that it was their duty to act when called upon by the governor for that purpose.

Whatever Senators may think, the President does not justify interference by the Government.

The President declares in his message he did not give the order for interference. Further, he says on page 7 of the same message:

I have no desire to have United States troops interfere in the domestic concerns of Louisiana or of any other State.

Now, sir, that reads very well in print. It sounds very well in words. When, however, we remember that the President was privy to the usurpation of 1872; when we recall the recent message that he sent to us in regard to Arkansas affairs, we might say with the Latin poet—Sic notus Ulysses.

But, sir, notwithstanding the declarations of the President in this message, the deed has been done, the usurpation has been accomplished. Yet no one is censured, no one is recalled, no one reprimanded, and no one punished. Senators do not pretend to defend the act, and the Army is still retained in place. As was in substance said by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and by others, inasmuch as it has been done, they were not disposed to see it undone.

We have the evidence that an act of despotism and usurpation has been accomplished in Louisiana, and yet the Senators of the dominant party are willing the government thus established should be kept in power, and are unwilling that it should be resolved back into a republican form: one of the people. I do not know that any other Senator has pretended to justify the acts that have been perpetrated in Louisiana unless it be the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] who claimed to justify it on the ground that it was intended to quell a riot. If I understood his argument rightly, it was to the effect that the governor of Louisiana, as chief magistrate, had the right to call on the military of the United States to suppress riots, and that De Trobriand entered the State-house, with his sword by his side and his platoon of soldiers with him, rightfully and for the purpose of quelling a riot. When we have the evidence before us that De Trobriand had possession of the State-house; that he let nobody in there except by the permit of his authority; that by a cordon of soldiers the State-house was corraled, and every man therein was there only with his consent, it is very strange that De Trobriand would enter his own castle thus guarded and protected to quell a riot among those he had so completely under his control. If that was a riot, about the time the Senator was speaking there was a similar riot in the State-house of Pennsylvania, and equally good reason for Federal interference in the organization of the Legislature of that State. The breaking up of a democratic organization of a Legislature, removing members claiming to be elected, and then reorganizing a republican Legislature in its place may be quelling a riot in political ethics, but it is something new in jurisprudence.

Sheridan, unacquainted with law, has exhibited a disposition to trample laws and constitutions under foot, and asks for unusual and unlimited powers; and yet he remains in place unrecalled and unrebuked.

Why was Sheridan sent to Louisiana? Where was the necessity? McDowell was the general of division in command, an officer of high rank and of recognized ability. The General of the Army, of the very highest rank and of the very highest ability, was close at hand. Why were they not called upon? It seems that it required some more reckless, more subservient, more despotic officer to perform what was required to be done in Louisiana. Whether it was to give the coup de grace to liberty in Louisiana or to accomplish a coup d'état for other purposes, the impulse seemed to be—

If it were done, when 'tis done, then 't were well it were done quickly.

When we ask for information and criticise these proceedings, how are we answered? By high-sounding notes in praise of Sheridan and in denunciation of the people of Louisiana as rebels and murderers; that they are engaged in slaughtering negroes by the thousand, and that they are yet in a state of quasi rebellion against the Government. In that connection we have the report that was sent to us from the Secretary of War, in which we have the communication from Lieutenant Colonel Morrow, of December 24, an officer who was there in Louisiana, better acquainted with the condition of affairs than perhaps any other officer that has communicated information to the Department, and I ask the Secretary to read what I have marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I now come to the general condition of affairs in the parishes on Red River, and, without the slightest exaggeration, I may say it is bad. Respect and regard for the General Government are expressed by all classes of people, and so is the determination not to be, under any circumstances, brought into collision with the Federal troops; but there is a universal expression of contempt for the State government, and, so far as language could express it, there is open defiance of its authority. The governor is everywhere and by almost every white man denounced a "usurper," and the determination is openly expressed by nearly every white man not to submit to his usurpation longer than submission is compelled by the presence and force of Federal soldiers.

Dissatisfaction and discontent are plainly visible in all the acts and conversation of the people, and the result is manifest in almost every department of business. Uncultivated fields, unrepaired fences, roofless and dilapidated dwellings, and abandoned houses meet the eye at every step, and the whole aspect of the country has a look of poverty and neglect. The schools in many parishes are closed for want of money to pay the teachers, and I was told again and again that the school funds had been stolen by the State officials. In one parish a criminal court had not been held in nearly two years, and in other parishes no court, criminal or civil, had been held for a long time. In a community where there are no courts crime finds a genial soil, and the natural result is that the law has fallen into disregard and disrepute. Judges were openly charged with corruption, and money, and not justice, is charged with turning the judicial scale.

The people reported and seem to believe that the machinery of the Federal courts had been used to oppress them for political ends, and that the Federal troops had been used for political purposes. How far this has been the case I have no means of knowing, but I do believe that deputy United States marshals have used United States soldiers in cases where there was no necessity for them, and, from my investigations, in the parishes of Ouachita and Lincoln, I am quite certain that these civil officers discharged their duties in an unnecessarily harsh if not cruel manner. It was represented to me that the marshals are in the habit of prowling through the country in the night time, accompanied by a posse of soldiers, to make arrests of citizens who could be arrested by the marshal unaided, and under any circumstances should be arrested in the open daylight.

The complaints against the State officers were so numerous that a mere enumeration of them would fill a volume. Corruption and jobbing in office; partiality and favoritism in the administration of justice; exorbitant taxes, rising in some instances to 7 and 8 per cent. on the appraised value of the property; a ruined credit; a depleted State and parish treasury; enormous debts, State and parish; and multiplication of officers in the person of favored individuals, are a few of the charges made by the people against their State authorities.

The political condition of the State is the one subject of conversation everywhere, in public and private, and among all classes, except the negro, who feels no interest in it, because he does not comprehend it. The dissatisfaction is wide-spread and deep, and I am firmly convinced that sooner or latter there will be an outbreak of public feeling which will be attended by scenes of fearful violence. The determination to escape from the rule of the present State government is fixed in every mind, and whenever the opportunity presents itself a blow will be struck for the "liberation of Louisiana," to use the expression in common use. A combination or organization among the white men ramifies every parish and neighborhood, and there is a perfect unanimity of sentiment and will be concert of action whenever the time comes to take a decisive stand. Without going into needless details, I give the following as my deep-seated convictions: The present State government cannot maintain itself in power a single hour without the protection of Federal troops. I do not believe that the present State authorities, even with the protection of Federal troops, will be able to collect taxes and perform the functions of government after an early day in the new year. Opposition to them will be made at every turn, and every step they attempt to take will be beset with obstructions. Outside of New Orleans there is no party or organization in the State with sufficient strength or influence to afford the slightest aid. The State government has not the confidence or respect of any portion of the community.

I not only do not believe, but I am absolutely certain, that there will not be, at any time, in Louisiana any organized or authorized resistance to the General Government. If the expressions of the people are to believed, and I do believe them, there is a very sincere desire to live quietly under the protection of the Constitution of the United States and enjoy the blessings of the National Government. But there is no disguising the fact the protection afforded by the Federal Administration to the government of the present State executive is the cause of bitter personal and political feeling in the breasts of nineteen-twentieths of the white inhabitants of the State.

Mr. HAGER. Colonel Morrow's report is the latest and best official information we have as to the true condition of the State of Louisiana. It is dated December 24, 1874, and to it is appended the following:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Saint Louis, Missouri, January 4, 1875.

This paper is most respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War with a request that he submit it for the personal perusal of the President. I know of no officer of Colonel Morrow's rank who is better qualified to speak and write of matters like this, and his opinions are entitled to great consideration. I profess to have some knowledge of the people of that section, both white and black, from a long residence among them before the war and several visits since, but I shall not intrude my opinion in the confusion in which the subject is now enveloped.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

This is a letter from the General of the Army commending that communication to the special personal consideration of the President. Colonel Morrow does not speak of crimes and murders, but he speaks of roofless and dilapidated buildings, abandoned houses, desolated homes; that judges were openly charged with corruption, and money, not justice, is charged with turning the judicial scale; and that the State government has not the confidence nor the respect of any portion of the community.

In connection with that same subject I have here a document addressed by the Southern Patrons of Husbandry to their brethren, which I should like to have read. I believe it has not yet been referred to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PATRONS OF HUSBANDRY,
OFFICE OF THE STATE GRANGE OF LOUISIANA,
68 Camp Street, New Orleans, January 16, 1875.

At a joint session of the executive committees of the State granges of Louisiana and Mississippi, called at New Orleans by Worthy Master H. W. L. Lewis, on the 16th day of January, 1875, the following appeal to the Patrons of Husbandry throughout the United States was offered and unanimously adopted:

To the Patrons of Husbandry throughout the United States:

After mature and most thoughtful consideration, and after long hesitations in appealing to you on the subject of our domestic governmental disturbances, we can no longer remain silent. The people here do not govern! They are the subjects of satraps. Men rule here who have no sympathy with the people of any race, color, or previous condition. Government has become a speculation, a huge monopoly, and, as patrons, we know that when these things exist with power, the people—especially the farmers—suffer. We are loaded with debt accumulated by these governmental monopolies; taxes are eating up what little property the late unhappy and fratricidal war left us. Capital avoids us or locks itself in the dark cells and coffers of the cautious. Our broad savannas and magnolia-crowned summits are desolations; and the grandest soil on the continent hungers and begs for the trusty, hardy, and worthy sons of the soil in the West and North; but, alas! it hungers and begs in vain, for the Government is against us, and your brothers avoid it as a lazar-house. Give us peace. Give us good government. Give us the rule of our people. Take the military of the General Government from our houses, homes, and legislative halls—and so shed upon us the glorious light of true republicanism, the splendid civilization and true liberty of America.

We assemble on this occasion for the purpose of entering into an extended discussion of this whole subject, and giving to you, brothers throughout the United States, a simple statement of facts, under our obligations as patrons, of all our troubles; but happily we have been forestalled by the sub-committee of the Congress of the United States, whose report has just reached us. Believe us, this report, made by gentlemen of the North, and intelligent Congressmen of both political parties, tells the truth. We refer to it, and trust that every patron to whom this appeal may come will give it an attentive reading.

A. G. CARTER,
Chairman Executive Committee of Louisiana.
L. O. BRIDEWELL.
Chairman Executive Committee of Mississippi.

Official:
WM. H. HARRIS.
Secretary State Grange, Louisiana.

Resolved, That the press of the United States be requested to publish this appeal of the Patrons of Husbandry of the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to the patrons throughout the United States, and that this resolution be appended to said appeal.

Such are the matters, as related by these documents, of which Louisiana complains; and yet it is boldly asserted by Senators in face of these facts that this exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the Government and military has been in behalf of humanity and as friends of the country. Friends of humanity! Senators, you are staking it on the means of ruin and convulsion. Friends of the country! You are rapidly becoming its iron parricides, cleaving down its institutions for partisan purposes and tearing them limb from limb—not man's inhumanity, but in this instance man's humanity to man makes Louisiana's burdens greater than her people can bear.

But it has been frequently asserted during this debate that there has been a great decrease in the negro vote in the South, which is evidence of fraud in the late elections. I would ask does the negro vote belong to the republican party by right of conquest as booty of war? Perhaps the blacks of the South as well as the whites of the North have discovered that it is to their interest to vote with the conservatives. In the South the whites and the blacks are dependent on each other. Their future destiny for good or for evil is necessarily intermingled. The one is the owner of the soil; the other supplies the labor. If they are to live in harmony, there must be accord in feelings as well as in interest. To array the one in hostility to the other is an act of barbarity calamitous to each and to the prosperity of their State.

But, sir, the republican vote of the South has not diminished more than it has elsewhere; and if that be a cause for interposition with Federal authority in Louisiana, the same or greater cause there must be for interference in New York, Pennsylvania, and other States. In the late election the contest was one in which other elements than those of mere politics were involved. It was a movement on the part of the people pro patria. It was in behalf of honesty against dishonesty in matters pertaining to government, of reform against corruption and wide-spread demoralization, of well-administered constitutional government against usurpation and lawlessness. The conservative element, non-combatants in party politics, that large class of thinking, intelligent men who vote for country rather than party, supported by the independent press, have availed themselves of opposition organizations and best nominations to set their seal of condemnation upon the dominant party and a corrupt and despotic administration of the Government. The result is that the great republican party, late so powerful, so reckless, and so arrogant, is to-day prostrate not only in Louisiana but also in New York, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and other States, with its pride and its banner humbled in the dust. But the lesson is not understood, and Senators are at a loss to account for this great change in public sentiment. It was not accomplished by the slaughter of negroes or by fraud North or South, but by—

> Freemen casting with unpurchased hand
> The vote that shakes the turrets of the land.

Read its causes in the reckless, aggressive legislation of Congress. With a deranged, depreciated paper currency; with the accumulated burden of a great national debt, and a high protective tariff upon the necessaries of life, look at the legislation of Congress. Special privileges, subsidies, bonuses have been bestowed with unsparing hand, contracts have been awarded—even the collection of the revenues farmed out, by which party favorites have been enriched at the expense of the Government without the expenditure on their part of a dollar. Extravagance, peculation, and corruption pervade every Department of the Government, and scarcely a day passes but we hear of frauds, defalcations, and peculations being practiced, and practiced with impunity, by Government officials. Public opinion has reached the conclusion that unless there be some reform of the abuses of the administration of public affairs; unless the usurpation and extravagance of the Government be checked; unless the avalanche of corruption which now is threatening and impending over us be stayed, they will soon come upon us with such crushing force as utterly to destroy and overwhelm us as a nation. A sublime proclamation stands on record. God said, "Let there be light: and there was light." In the recent elections the people said, "Let there be light:" and there is light. Vox populi, vox Dei. It is tinging the western and the eastern hills. It may not yet have illumined this Chamber, but there is the dawn of a better day at the other end of the Capitol. It has brought joy and confidence and hope to our despairing people, especially to those of our own race and lineage of the South, who are struggling for wife and child and sacred home against an invasion of vandal spoilsmen from the North and a tyranny and oppression on the part of the Government unparalleled in the history of the nation. I trust, sir, that this light is yet destined to illumine the land and bring the nation back to honesty, reason, intelligence, and truth. May God speed the day!

Mr. President, facts and popular sentiment in Louisiana, so far as developed, indicate beyond a reasonable doubt that in the recent election in that State the popular vote was with the conservatives. Equally conclusive does it appear to me that by a combination between the same parties who conceived and effected the usurpation in 1872 the people of Louisiana were prevented from installing in office the officers they elected. The determination is manifest in despite of the popular vote, in despite of Constitution and laws, to establish negro supremacy, and through the negro the supremacy of the republican party in Louisiana. To effect this the white race and its civilization must be made subservient to the black race and its civilization—the black race just emerged from the condition of slaves, and which as a people has never exhibited any administrative capacity for self-government. We may rejoice that the genius of American liberty is no longer destined to bear a fettered companion by her side in the car of triumph; but I am not among those who believe it is the mission of the American Republic to champion this race and place them in the van of civilization to the exclusion of our own race. Better that the republican party should die and that our race and the Constitution live. This black race has been emancipated, made citizens, armed with the ballot, and like all other citizens must work out their destiny according to their capacity. You cannot legislate them into a more exalted condition than nature has placed them in, or the people into a belief in their intellectual equality. You might as well undertake by legislation to remove the distinguishing marks in their physiology that characterize their race from ours, or to legislate the people into a belief in the Darwinian theory of the creation or any particular system of theology or metaphysics.

Sir, I have no prejudices against this race on account of color and previous condition. I acknowledge all their constitutional rights under the late amendments to the Constitution. I have no wish to disturb them. Involuntarily, by the avarice and cupidity of our race, they were sold and purchased in every State of the Union where slave labor was profitable. Upon their emancipation they should have been regarded as wards of the nation and taken care of as such on reservations or colonized, as has been the case with the Indians, although I would wish them a better fate and kinder treatment than has befallen the Indians. Upon their emancipation they were ignorant, uneducated, and incapacitated for governmental purposes; they had no interest in the soil, and were dependent upon the white race even for subsistence.

It was necessary for them as well as the white race, if they were to live in accord and peace, that they should be in harmony. But, sir, other counsels prevailed; they have been the instruments, not the subjects, of reconstruction and legislation. Numerically, if not intellectually, they proved a voting power too available to withstand partisan purposes. But this is not sufficient. The struggle is still pending in the effort by penal laws to force the two races into social relations which set at defiance the laws of nature, our tastes, our reason, and public sentiment even in our families. Is this malice or philanthropy? Is it the behest of party or a sense of duty that dictates this policy? And why is it confined to the African race? There is another race in our midst, the aborigines of the country, more homogeneous as a race, more entitled to our sympathy, once the lords paramount of our vast domain, native to the soil, and yet driven from their homes and habitations. Is there no tear of sympathy and no philanthropy for the Indian? Is he not also our brother and part of the great human family? Sir, we have evidence that the Indian has attained a higher civilization, a more advanced position in art and science than was ever attained by the negro in his native Africa. To the Indian the Congress has sent balls and bayonets and reservations; to his inferior, the negro, it would send not only political and social eqality, but dominion in government. Can this inconsistency be explained? Perhaps it consists in this: The Indian is of no political significance, but the negro, if properly managed, can contribute something to sustain a decaying party.

Sir, as a member of the senate of the State of California, it was my privilege to vote for the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. I regarded the question of slavery as involved in the war; that it was placed in the wager of battle, and that by the wager of battle it was determined. It was guaranteed and protected by the Constitution, but by the adoption of this amendment, acquiesced in by the South, it was abolished; and I sincerely hoped that there would never thereafter be a great national question to disturb us as a people or prevent us from fulfilling that great destiny which I believe, in the providence of God, lies before us. It was also my privilege to vote against the ratification of the fifteenth amendment, and I then expressed my views at length in regard to that proposition; and as they were reported at the time by the press, in order to show to what extent I prognosticated what would ensue, I will here reproduce some of the views I expressed on that occasion. I ask the Secretary to read what is marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

This suffrage question is not without its difficulties and embarrassments, and is attracting attention in all civilized countries having any pretensions to free institutions. Since the decay of the feudal system there has been a struggle on the part of the people to resist oppression and to gain power. The tendency of modern civilization has been to destroy aristocracies, level ranks, and diffuse power among the people. A writer has justly remarked: The history of European society is the history of the feudal system; the record of its rise and growth is the history of Roman polity and primitive barbarism; the record of its decline and fall is the history of modern social development. Ancient progress was toward extreme social and political inequality; modern progress is toward extreme social and political equality. Submission was the great lesson taught by the former; freedom is the still greater lesson taught by the latter. Monarchies and aristocracies were the flowers of the old seed; democracy is the first fruit of the new. This is true of all homogeneous peoples, peoples of the same race and lineage, and only as to such. Under our system we recognize no distinctions among men of races kindred with our own, but admit all, without regard to station or intelligence, to political and social equality. Perhaps for the first time we present to the world the singular spectacle of a superior race struggling to admit an inferior degraded race to political and social equality, when, too, that race has not capacity sufficient to demand it as a right, or intelligence enough to understand or exercise it if it should be conferred. In England in particular this suffrage question is engaging the attention of publicists, the Parliament, and the press. Much has been spoken and written in regard to impartial manhood suffrage, and arguments used there have been reiterated by our public men in this country, where in fact they have no application.

But in England the people are not struggling for equality of races, but for political, religious, and industrial freedom, which is constitutional with us. There the people have not yet fully attained free school, free church, free press, and free assembly, which is also constitutional with us. The liberalists there do not contend that all are qualified to enjoy the elective franchise; but, as we gather their ideas from the publications of the day, progression with them tends to the evolution of a preponderating power in the State—well understood and recognized by us—the power of the people; and the result they wish to attain is what we enjoy—self-government by an intelligent people. By the term manhood suffrage they do not intend suffrage should be extended to all classes properly belonging to the genus homo, but by manhood is meant the physical, mental and moral maturity of a nation, and political progress consists in bringing within the pale of the Constitution so much of the national manhood and no more than is qualified. No English reformer is so insane or fanatic as to clamor for extending the elective franchise to all races of men, as, for instance, to their subjects in South Africa, the Hottentot, or to their subjects in Asia, the Hindo, or the native of India. John Stuart Mill, perhaps the most liberal and progressive of all, while he is disposed to disregard all distinctions of sex or color, would yet limit suffrage to those who could read an English book or do a sum in the rule of three.

To ratify this amendment and admit this race without restriction to the enjoyment of the elective franchise and exclude those who participated in the rebellion, is to surrender the greater portion of the Southern States to the dominion of the blacks. For a time they may be controlled by the Congress and its agents as is now the case, but soon leaders of their own race or of ours will appear on the surface, and what will be the result? Necessarily class legislation, in which the majority will legislate to promote its own interest, and the interest of the minority and the general interest will be disregarded. Such are the teachings of history. Suppose, as is aptly put by Mill in discussing this question, the majority are whites and the minority are blacks, or the reverse, is it at all probable the majority would allow equal justice to the minority? Or, as he further says, suppose the majority are Protestants and the minority Catholics, or the majority are English and the minority Irish, or the reverse, would there not be the same danger; or, to bring the matter home to ourselves, if under this amendment Congress should extend suffrage to the Chinese, and they should be in the majority, what would be the result here to our own white race? If the policy of the Congress prevails, the result will be we will have States composed of different races, which, by the inevitable laws of nature and population, can never become homogeneous, either socially or politically, in which the governing power will be controlled by the numerically preponderating race. Which that may be in the Southern States or in our own State remains to be revealed in the future. When the Congress shall abandon the idea of legislating negroes into white men, and of retaining the political control in the late insurgent States by negro suffrage for purposes of party supremacy, reconstruction becomes easy. If the same amount of money spent for these purposes had been expended to encourage emigration from Europe, we might have added to our population at least ten millions of inhabitants of our own race and lineage—worth more to us than the whole African race.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, although entertaining these views at that time, I bow to the supremacy of the Constitution and accept the negro as a citizen and a voter and as our equal before the law, I am willing to extend to him words of encouragement, and if he proves himself our equal physically, mentally, and intellectually, I will rejoice. If he outstrips us in the race for supremacy I shall be willing to yield him the palm.

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, or so much as it is necessary to cite, is as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The fifteenth, as we all know, is that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Our Government under State and Federal Constitutions is a representative government, with a distribution of powers, as we all know, between the executive, the legislative, and the judiciary. It is composed of States sovereign to the extent of written compacts, with a Federal Government sovereign to the extent of delegated power, recognizing the source of all power to be with the people, and leaving the elective franchise to be settled and determined by the respective States. To what extent are these amendments limitations on the States? To the extent expressed in the amendments. It is for the judiciary, not the Executive or the Congress, to determine if a State law be in contravention of these amendments or not. There the negro is protected in all his constitutional rights. Congress may legislate to provide remedies and to facilitate actions in the courts if any citizen is deprived of any constitutional rights, but Congress has no more right now than before the amendments to annul the legislation of a State than a State has authority to annul acts of Congress. Neither has the President, or the military any more constitutional authority to invade the States than they had before these amendments were made—either to annul or interfere with the elections or to organize or destroy State governments. To do so is a usurpation dangerous to the whole Union and to our republican form of government.

But the Congress is not satisfied with these constitutional guarantees, but is engaged in efforts by legislation to make the white and the black races homogeneous by forcing on them social equality; and I confess that I have heard with abhorrence during the present and at the first session of this Congress utterances within this Chamber in support of this kind of legislation favoring the total obliteration of social distinction between the races.

Now, sir, although it be an old subject, what is the history and character of this negro race for which our own must be degraded and displaced, our country convulsed, and our Constitution invaded and endangered? Historically speaking, we have known something of him for the last four thousand years, from the days of Moses and the Egyptian kings. As he was in his native Africa four thousand years ago, so he remains at this day unchanged and unimproved, still engaged in fetich worship, still practicing human sacrifices, and the kings of Dahomy are at this day floating in their reservoirs of human blood as they were centuries ago. We have seen him on this continent in Hayti attempting to found a state and to build up a government upon the ruins of one of our own race, excluding the white man from all participation in that government, and what find we there? Degeneracy and decay. We have seen him in Jamaica emancipated, outnumbering the whites; and what find we there? The island, once among the most lovely and prolific on the sea, is to-day regressing to its primitive forest and jungle, and the negro is relapsing into his primitive barbarism. We have seen him in Mexico and Central America in the mixed blood; and there, too, we find degeneracy and decay. On his native continent we have heard of Egyptian and Carthagenian states. On the borders of that same Mediterranean Sea that bounds his native continent we have heard of Syrian, Phœnician, Grecian, Roman states; but who ever yet heard of an African negro state that has emerged from barbarism and risen to any position among civilized nations?

There have been various degrees of progress and civilization among the Aztecs and Incas on this continent, in Japan, China, India, Persia, Arabia; but the African negro in his native Africa remains as unchanged at this day as the African baboon. We search in vain in the dim mists of the past for their philosophers, their mathematicians, their astronomers, their civil engineers, their political economists. We in vain explore their records to find a Plato, a Socrates, a Newton, a Bacon, a Shakespeare. Such is the past; now what will the future reveal?

We are told, and it has been reiterated again and again in this Chamber, that all men are created equal. I admit it. That it is so declared by the great charter of our liberties, the Declaration of Independence. I do not deny it. All men are equal precisely in the sense in which it was intended by the framers of that instrument—equal in the enjoyment of all natural rights; equal to breathe the free air of heaven and to enjoy the light of the sun, moon, and stars; equal to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow; equal to partake of the fruits of the earth and the waters of the babbling brooks. In these respects all men are equal. But to say that they are physically, mentally, morally equal is a fallacy that never has been and never will be true. It is not true of our own race. It is not true of Senators in this Chamber. It is not true even of brothers in the same family. One may be a Hercules in strength, another a mere pigmy. One may be a Henry or a Webster, holding senates and assemblies spell-bound by his eloquence, while another is a mere mumbling idiot. One may be a mathematician or astronomer, calculating the dimensions of the sun, moon, and stars, and their distances from each other, while another, with all the education you may bestow upon him, is incapable of demonstrating the simplest problem in mathematics. One may be a poet, soaring on the wings of song, while another is incapable of turning two lines of rhythm. One may be a meek and lowly follower of his divine Master, engaged in works of charity and love, while another is never satisfied unless he is engrossed with scenes of violence and blood. Are these men equal—physically, morally, mentally equal? Is the Laplander of the north of Europe the equal of the intelligent German of Central Europe? Is the Hottentot of South Africa the equal of the Italian of South Italy? Are the Esquimaux of the north, or the aborigines, the Indians in our midst, the equal of the men I see about me in this Chamber?

But, sir, I shall not undertake to discuss this question theologically or psychologically. I am willing to concede that Adam was the great final consummation of the works of the Almighty, and that He then rested from his labors. I do not dispute it; but how He arrived at this great consummation we have not been informed. Whether it was by gradual advancement or by one act of creation has not been revealed to us.

Paleontology has disclosed foot-prints on the sands of time—stepping-stones—showing that much has been dropped by the wayside and become extinct before the end was reached. In our researches in natural history, in physiology, and in ethnology we find much to attract our attention and to engage our serious reflection. We can do this philosophically without subjecting ourselves to the charge of intention to ridicule any portion of the creation.

When we see the monkey sometimes dressed in our habiliments we are amused and surprised at his displays of watchfulness and intelligence. He looks something like our race, but we do not regard him as such. A step higher and we have the ourang and the chimpanzee, and the resemblance is yet greater, but we do not receive them as of the human family. Still a step upward and we have the gorilla, and there the resemblance is still stronger. In the gorilla you have the same bodily organization, without the caudal appendage, the same articulations, the same internal viscera, the same venous and arterial circulation of the blood, the same nervous system and vital organs, substantially the same number of bones in the body; and the most skillful anatomist is unable to distinguish his skeleton or the greater portion of it from that of the human race when they are intermingled; but we do not regard him as of the human family.

Now, sir, I do not wish it to be understood that I am making these remarks with any view to compare this portion of the creation with the negro, but rather with the human family generally, while referring to certain physiological and ethnological facts. Leaving the gorilla and advancing upward we reach the savage of Australia and Borneo, the wild man of the interior of those islands, untamable and unapproachable; without a written or spoken language; uttering an unintelligible muttering gibberish, and fleeing from the face of the white man like the beasts of the forest. Does humanity commence here? Is this the dividing line? When we leave the Australian savage and pursue our investigations further through the different races or species or types of mankind—place the negro where you please, I have no disposition to misplace him—through the Esquimaux and the Digger Indian, the lowest of the race on this continent, through the Kanaka, the Hottentot, the Arab, the Mongolian, &c., we finally reach the last great consummation, the crowning work of the Almighty when he rested—the Caucasian Adam, the type of man I see about me in this Chamber.

Now, sir, admitting that the human family are all a part of the same brotherhood and of the same creation, must we not admit that there are types, varieties, species of man that we can neither ignore nor conceal? And this distinction pervades the whole animal creation. The Newfoundland and the poodle, the greyhound and the spaniel belong to the same family. Are they equal? The thoroughbred, the donkey, the Shetland pony, and the zebra are different species of the same race—the genus equus; are they equal? I do not think the donkey is the equal of the horse; nor do I think it possible to legislate them into physical or social equality. You may cross them and you have the hybrid, the mule; but you cannot propagate a race of mules.

You may cross the negro with the white race and you have the mule, or the mulatto, which is a synonymous word, but you cannot propagate a race of mulattoes; you must go back to the original stock, on the one side or the other, or the race will become extinct. Such are the facts and they are as well ascertained as anything that is recorded in physiology. So with the aborigines of this continent. They have disappeared before the approach of civilization, and the white race, like the forest. So with the Kanaka of the Sandwich Islands intermingled with our race; he is rapidly dying out. So, too, with the admixture of blood in Mexico and Central America—you have but to go there to learn it is limited by inexorable laws. We cannot change the immutable laws of the creation by legislation, but must accept of facts as they are. Long back in the past the question was asked, Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots? The answer to-day is the same that it was two thousand years ago. In our Father's house, as we are instructed, there are many mansions; so it might be said in our Father's family there are many races or species of mankind. We cannot change it by legislation. Leave it where God and the immutable laws of the creation have left it, now and forever, for man cannot cover what God has revealed.

But, sir, if we extend social equality to the negro, can we deny it to the Chinese? They are superior as a race to the negro. They have attained a higher civilization and have maintained a government for thousands and thousands of years, and far beyond historic records. We on the Pacific coast have a peculiar interest in this question. We are in that position where western and eastern civilization meet. We have to breast this influx of immigration that is flowing in upon us from Asia. With our new commercial relations and with steam communication with Asia; with these new ideas of political and social equality among all races of men, what is the future destined to reveal in California and on the Pacific coast? China might, without injury to herself, spare from her surplus population a million or ten million men, sufficient to give to that race the control and dominion on the Pacific.

We in California have tried by legislation to prohibit Chinese immigration—especially such as are brought there as coolies and for immoral purposes—and by penal laws have tried to exclude them, in order to protect our people from demoralization and contamination. But we have not succeeded. These laws have been sustained by our tribunals and by the unanimous opinion of the supreme court of our State. But recently a case occurred where some Chinese women, imported, as it was proven, for immoral purposes, were remanded under the laws of California to the vessel that brought them there to be transported back to China. This judgment, on appeal to the supreme court, was unanimously affirmed; yet a Federal judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, who happened to be there at the time, released them on habeas corpus because, as he held, their detention was in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; in other words, that that amendment gave the same protection to coolies and prostitutes that it did to decent people, and that no legislation of the State of California could prevail against it. If this be the law, in the course of a few years Chinese coolies and prostitutes may be in dominion in California, and may as thoroughly control the destiny of that State as the negroes now control in South Carolina, provided you extend to that race political and social equality. I presume consistency will require this to be done.

Is it more improbable that political and social equality will be extended to the Chinese in the next ten years than it was ten years ago that it would be extended to the emancipated slaves of the South? They have proved themselves superior as a race to the negro, and have exhibited a better capacity to govern. As far as possible you have placed the negro in the van of civilization in the South, and are struggling by acts of despotism to maintain him there. How long will it be before the Chinese will take the same position on the Pacific? If you recognize universal political and social equality among races and species of man, you cannot deny to him what you require shall be yielded to the negro.

In this respect we have presented to the world a memorable example, for the first time recorded in history, where a superior race has struggled to place an inferior one on social and political equality with themselves; and that, too, when the inferior race had not the power to enfoce it and did not demand it as a right. If it be necessary to control the States of the Pacific for political purposes, will not the same influences now operating in Louisiana demand that suffrage shall be extended to the Chinese?

But, sir, it is sometimes asked, why do you object? Do you fear the rivalry of these inferior races and that they may outstrip us in the race for supremacy? No; I have no such fears. As soon might you expect the thoroughbred as he nobly leaps from the springing turf should be outstripped in the race by the browsing donkey. As well might you expect that the—

> Falcon, towering in her pride of place,
> Should by a mousing owl be hawk'd at, and kill'd.

No; I do not fear that they will outstrip us in anything, unless in some of the Southern States the negro or in California the Chinese may outstrip us in number. But with these new ideas as to amalgamation, miscegenation, civil rights, and social equality now prevailing, with juxtaposition and density of population, I fear in the slow revolving years of the future we may present to the world that effete and moribund national condition that we now see exemplified in Mexico and Central America. While we cannot raise them up to our level, they may drag us down.

Now, Mr. President, it is not the part of wisdom nor does humanity require that, either by legislation or by usurpation, we should place the negro or the Mongolian in dominion over men of our own race and lineage or force them into social relations in violation of the laws of creation and the rational judgment of mankind. Such were not the teachings of the founders of the Republic. They came here from civilized Europe seeking political and religious liberty and social equality. They landed upon this then unexplored continent where before them was wide, unbounded, magnificent wilderness, where sprang and fell the forest leaves, where ebbed and flowed the ocean's tide in uninterrupted stillness, where the same sun that looked upon the vast empires they had left, their moldering kingdoms, their solemn temples, their gorgeous palaces, their oppressive aristocracies, here looked upon the still dwelling of utter loneliness where nature sat enthroned in original beauty undisturbed by the tyrannies, the oppressions, and fettered humanities of the lands they had left. They met almost beneath the wide-spreading branches of this primeval forest—for what? To discuss the rights of man, forms of government, and social equality. They founded a state; they framed a constitution. The negro and the Indian were here. Did they recognize them as of their fraternity? Did they take the negro and hug him and press him to their hearts as an equal and a brother? Did they talk of or practice amalgamation or miscegenation? No such fanaticism then prevailed. Why, sir, among the earliest of my recollections in my own home in a northern State, and my friend the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] I may also say my friend of former years in our native State, will probably corroborate what I say, whether it was in the public school-room, in the domestic circle, or in the holy sanctuary, the black man and the white man had each their place. State after State was admitted, constitution after constitution was formed, and yet it was an almost universally recognized principle of constitutional law that the governing power was the white race.

Such were the example and teaching of our fathers. But they went further. They invited friends and relatives they had left in the Old World to join them in the New. They passed naturalization laws to encourage immigration. Did they extend them to the negro or to the Indian? No, they confined them to our own white race; and in our legislation a few days ago to correct mistakes in the revised laws you were reminded of this when we went through the form of restoring the word "white" in the naturalization laws because it had been expunged without authority. All Europe availed themselves of our liberal laws, and ship after ship freighted with men of our own white race have landed upon our shores and added to our population and to our prosperity, and the supply is yet unexhausted. And all Europe is to-day thankful for the blessings that our institutions have conferred upon the human race. Go among the laboring classes of Europe, go to Germany, to Switzerland, to Ireland, tell them you are an American, and see the radiant face, the sparkling eye as group after group gather around you to inquire after friends who, more fortunate than they, have reached this land of abundance and prosperity. Listen, too, if you will to the downtrodden, broken-hearted man as from under the covering cloud of his poverty and his oppressions he pours forth his prayer to the Father of all that ours may be the steady, the radiant course that shall never bewilder or betray. So let us join him in his prayer that it may be. Let the downtrodden and oppressed of all civilized nations still hail our country as the lifeboat of liberty to the world, as the little ark destined of Heaven to bear it through all the dangers of tempest and of deluge. But God forbid, Senators, God forbid that we should extend this invitation to or amalgamate with the semi-civilized hordes of Asia, or with the barbarous tribes of Africa. They will but deteriorate our race and retard our civilization. Now our civilization on luminous wings soars eagle-like to Jove. Fetter it, weight it down, crush it to the earth by an admixture with these inferior races, and it needs no scroll—no prophet's scroll—to predict the Hyperions of this century may become satyrs in the next; that the noble godlike Caucasian North American that I see around me here may a century hence become what the ignoble hybrid Mexican or Central American is to-day.

In saying this, again I must disclaim any intention to reflect on any of God's creatures, either of the black or other races of man. I take them as we find them with no disposition to criticise or inveigh against the wisdom of their development, and fully impressed with our inability to change the laws that control the universe. As I have said, I concede to the negro all that the Constitution guarantees. But I ask you to examine the records of the past and instruct me, if it be possible, how you will inforce full social equality and an admixture of races without reaping the consequences we see exemplified in Mexico and Central America.

Mr. President, no imperial decree has been promulgated for the preservation of our country. She must rely upon the patriotism, the intelligence, and the devotion of her sons in the day of her prosperity as well as in the hour of her adversity. The warning voice of history of every country and of every age, as has been eloquently remarked, comes to tell us that republics when once lost are lost forever; that though their spirit never dies to others, it never revives when lost to regenerate themselves. Look at the shadows and darkness that have rested for ages on the habitations of the Holy City. Look at despotism worse than either as it has brooded with raven wing upon the very bosom of the buried republics, and let us be warned by their mysterious doom.

Does the same destiny await us? Are we too to fall beneath the assaults of ambition and usurpation, the madness of some factious hour, and our country, now so grand, so full of hope, to be remembered as a delusive meteor which rose full of promise, dazzled with momentary splendor but to leave the world in greater darkness than before?

> A thousand years scarce serves to form a state;
> An hour may lay it in the dust.

A hundred years have not yet elapsed since our nation's birth, and yet we have almost verified the truth of the lines of the poet. We have undergone the fate of nations—been baptized in the blood and thunder of civil war. But it is not the first time that a nation has been thus scourged and afflicted. To say nothing of ancient times, point me to any modern nation that has risen to any proud distinction among the nations of the earth that has not had its civil war and its rebellions. Look at England, at revolutionary France, at Germany, at Italy, at Spain now in the midst of revolution; all have had their rebellions and civil wars; yet they live, and if they are not homogeneous it is attributable to other causes than animosities engendered by recollections of these calamities. Cannot we of the same race and lineage without giving the ascendency and dominion to the negro, without this social equality being thrust upon us, once more gather around the same common altar of our country, and hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder go through the great work of elevating our nation to that high position which I believe with good government she is destined to attain?

In the course of this debate Senators have expressed devotion to the country and a determination to cling to the ship of state whether she is to ride the waves in triumph or to be ingulfed. When corruption and demoralization are overspreading the land, when we see a growing intolerance of law throughout the country, a disregard for constitutional restraint, and a tendency to despotism at this great center, when we see legislation for the perpetuity of party rather than country, I would ask, in all solemnity and seriousness, is it not time to port the helm? Under your guidance the ship of state is drifting into turbulent waters and untried seas. The Constitution is overboard and you are without chart or compass. The warning voice of patriotism from all quarters of the land is exclaiming to you to-day in appealing tones, behold those treacherous rocks, that dangerous sea into which you are drifting. But you heed it not. Rather than give up the control of the ship, rather than surrender the political ascendency you now enjoy, you would dare the breakers. And yet what is party in comparison to country? Parties are ephemeral, rise and fall and pass away. In a few years the places that know us now will know us no more; but I trust our country will flourish in immortal youth, to bless those who may succeed us until the utmost generation of men. Again I would say, port the helm.

Senatoris est civilatis libertatem tueri. Let us bow to the injunction in a spirit of devotion and of love and of reverence for our country. It is the duty of the Senator to preserve the liberties of the State. It is the duty of the Senator to protect the Constitution of the country. Let us never forget to protect it. It comes to us as our heritage from Washington and his compatriots. So let it be preserved, or what remains of it be preserved inviolate. Cling to it with a patriot's love, with a father's enthusiasm, and with a Christian's hope. And in these degenerate days, amid the struggles for party supremacy, when blind ambition or treason or ultraism or usurpation would hawk at and tear it, let us, forgetting all and sacrificing all in its favor, inculcate the necessity of its preservation and of a once more harmonious and united country. Do it with that same devotion as of old chaste virgins kept bright the sacred fires upon the altars of Vesta, until shrine and worshiper perished amid the ruins of a shattered empire. Let your devotion, I say, be equal to this, and in the words of Lincoln, "with charity for all and with malice to none," our ship of state will again drift into a silent sea, and our glorious Union, like the rock of Megara upon which was placed the lyre of Apollo, will resound with the same voice of sweetness and of harmony from whichever side it may be touched. But if this violation and intolerance of law now so manifest is to continue unchecked, this tendency to usurpation is to pass unrebuked, and our republican institutions shall be once submerged in the rising tide of despotism, you will recover your liberties when the sun shall linger in the evening cloud forgetful of the voice of morning—

> When ships are drifting with the dead
> To shores where all is dumb.

Zachary Taylor Statue.

SPEECH OF HON. R. C. McCORMICK,

OF ARIZONA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1875.

The House having met, as in Committee of the Whole, for general debate—

Mr. McCORMICK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: On the 14th of December last I introduced the following joint resolution for the erection of an equestrian statue in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, in honor of General Zachary Taylor, twelfth President of the United States, namely:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War are hereby authorized and directed to contract, at a price not exceeding $20,000, for an equestrian statue, in bronze, of General Zachary Taylor, twelfth President of the United States, to be placed in the circle at the junction of Massachusetts avenue and Fourteenth street, northwest, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

I was led to this step not only by my high appreciation of the character of General Taylor and his services, both military and civil, to the American people, but also by the recent announcement that his grave is not marked by even the plainest slab, and that throughout this broad land, which he served so well, no monument worthy of the name has to this time been erected in his honor.

Representing as I do upon this floor a part of that vast and valuable domain which came under the American flag through the campaigns of Taylor and Scott, I have thought that I might with propriety introduce the resolution which I have read and advocate its passage as a matter of simple justice to the memory of one of the purest, bravest, and most sagacious of American generals.

In his address before the veterans of the Mexican War assembled in this city in September last, Albert Pike said:

More than to any other one man, more perhaps than to all others of our generals in Mexico, we owe to Zachary Taylor our victories and the extension of the Republic to the golden shores of California, with all the great results that have already come or are to come from these. There were greater battles fought in Mexico, and many beyond comparison, greater, in the number of combatants and loss of men in our civil war than Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and Buena Vista; but these were the first that destroyed Santa Anna's veterans and taught the Mexicans to expect defeat and our men to be confident of victory, no matter how much they were outnumbered; not that Taylor's men won greater glory, but that, being by good fortune the first to win, they made it possible for their fellow-soldiers under Scott to win equal glory with themselves. Taylor was one of those men of action to whom the nations always owe their greatness; like Clive, the savior and almost creator of the Anglo-Indian Empire, who early displayed an aversion to studious pursuits; like Marlborough, who, always victorious, never knew the sensation caused by defeat; like Suwaroff, conqueror of the Turkish provinces and of Poland. With little education, but considerable reading, of plain manners and simple habits, his will was inflexible and his resolution indomitable. He never hesitated or doubted, was never discouraged or dispirited.

* * * * * *

Fearless as Ney, he was a man of the largest truth and honesty and most perfect honor. He could not deceive or falter or equivocate. Clearly as he thought, he stammered in his speech, and no man was more incapable of oratory. But if he had been eloquent, that which is so easy would have been impossible to him. He could not have advocated the cause that he knew to be wrong, nor have been zealous to demonstrate that a lie was truth.

He was indeed, as a soldier, great without pretence—

And as the greatest only are,
In his simplicity sublime.

One who was with him in Mexico described him as in person—

A very thick-set farmer-looking, old gentleman, remarkable for short legs and a long body, mounted on a snow-white charger.

John J. Crittenden said of him in an eloquent speech at Pittsburgh:

He is a man you cannot buy, a man you cannot sell, a man you cannot scare, and a man who never surrenders.

His long service upon the frontier in Indian warfare, in which he was eminently successful, does not seem to have blunted the finer sensibilities of his nature. His biographers all say that among his many good qualities none was more conspicuous than the tenderness of heart which he ever exhibited toward the soldiers under his command as well as to the enemy. Like Washington he engaged in war only from necessity, and not from love of the dearly bought honors of military glory. More than once he was officially thanked for the civility and kindness shown to his prisoners and to all the inhabitants of Mexico with whom he came in contact.

Compared with our armies engaged in our late civil war the American force in Mexico, numbering as it did of regulars and volunteers a total of but one hundred thousand men, was small, but it was a working force, and its rapid and severe engagements will ever hold high rank in our military history. If faults may be detected in some of the operations when viewed with the knowledge of the motives and the powers of both parties, how trivial they appear when compared with the heroism displayed in every achievement and the brilliant success which ultimately crowned the conflict. Nor am I willing, as some have been, to speak lightly of the military qualities and achievements of our antagonists, now happily our friends, as displayed in this memorable war. The truth is the Mexicans fought well according to their character and training, and they were beaten "not so much," to borrow the words of another, "in consequence of their bad generalship, their want of courage, or of patriotism—for in these respects no deficiency can be really alleged against them—but because of the inferiority of the national morale."

General Taylor was yet in the field and had only won his first triumphs on the Rio Grande when he was regarded by a large body of the people as a proper candidate for the Presidency. To letters addressed to him upon the subject he replied that he was not a candidate and would take no steps to become such, and he did not; but his friends brought him forward even before the meeting of the national convention of the whig party in 1848, by which he was nominated over Clay, Webster, Scott, Clayton, and McLean.

The only message of President Taylor shows, says Benton, that he comprehended the difficulties of his position and was determined to grapple with them; that he saw where lay the dangers to the harmony and stability of the Union and was determined to lay these dangers bare to the public view, and as far as depended upon him to apply the remedies which their cure demanded.

The first and the last paragraphs of his message looked to this danger, and while the first showed his confidence in the strength of the Union, the latter admitted the dangers to it and averred his own determination to stand by it to the full extent of his obligations and powers. It was in these words:

But attachment to the Union of the States should be habitually fostered in every American heart. For more than half a century, during which kingdoms and empires have fallen, this Union has stood unshaken. The patriots who formed it have long since descended to the grave; yet still it remains the proudest monument to their memory, and the object of affection and admiration with every one worthy to bear the American name. In my judgment its dissolution would be the greatest of calamities, and to avert that should be the study of every American. Upon its preservation must depend our own happiness and that of countless generations to come. Whatever dangers may threaten it, I shall stand by it, and maintain it in its integrity, to the full extent of the obligations imposed and the power conferred upon me by the Constitution.

It will be remembered that he died in the second year of his Presidency, having as President fully maintained the popularity which had led to his election. His administration, so far as it went, was applauded by both great political parties, and he proved faithful to his declaration made when nominated for the highest office in the Republic—

I have no private purposes to accomplish, no party projects to build up, no enemies to punish, nothing to serve but my country.

Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to dwell at greater length upon the public and private virtues, the military and civil record of this representative American, whose life exhibits so much to challenge our admiration, our respect, and our gratitude; but I arose at this time, having had no other opportunity, simply to call attention to the resolution which has been referred to the Joint Committee of the Library, and upon which I hope for favorable action at the present meeting of Congress. I have been warmly thanked by the Associated Veterans of 1846, through their officers in this city, for the position I have taken in this matter, but I claim no interest in it beyond that which should animate every lover of his country and of the patriots who have given their lives and abilities to the defense of its liberties and its institutions. Among the more worthy of these Zachary Taylor must ever occupy an honorable and enviable distinction in history, and it is not for the reason that he needs a monument (for I believe with Hawthorne, that no man who needs a monument ever ought to have one) that I ask Congress to erect one to his memory, but because I thing the country cannot afford to let the services and example of such an illustrious man go unnoticed and unrecognized while inferior characters are commemorated in marble and in bronze at the public expense.

After such long and discreditable neglect, I trust the Government will provide that at least one prominent site in the capital city shall be decorated with a statue of the sturdy and genuine hero who, if sometimes "rough," was always "ready" honestly, courageously, and unselfishly to perform any duty and confront any danger to which his country summoned him.

And for his epitaph, let there be graven in letters of gold the words of his own famous dispatch to Secretary Marcy, dated at Army headquarters, March 3, 1847, namely:

I ask no favor and I shrink from no responsibility. I shall continue to devote all my energies to the public good, looking for my reward to the conciousness of pure motives and to the final verdict of impartial history.

Condition of Affairs in the South.

SPEECH OF HON. REES T. BOWEN,

OF VIRGINIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 19, 1875,

On the condition of affairs in the South.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. Speaker, I would be false to the people I have the honor to represent in this Hall were I not to mingle my voice with the Constitution-loving people of this great country, from every portion of which comes up remonstrances against the high-handed usurpation in the State of Louisiana.

I had hoped, sir, that in retiring from public life I should not be compelled, as among the last of my official acts, to criticise the conduct of the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic, and to denounce as the greatest political crime of this age the armed interference of Federal power in the organization of the Legislature of a sovereign State of the Union, and the ejection from their seats of five of its members claiming to have been duly elected, and whose rights to seats in that body could be lawfully determined by the Legislature alone. The act has had its parallel in England, but never before in a government like ours, where the people are the sovereigns and the law alone is king. What a spectacle was presented to the world as a commentary upon republican government on that memorable 4th day of January in the city of New Orleans! The representatives of a free State assembling to organize for deliberation on affairs in which the State was the party most deeply concerned, marching into a legislative hall surrounded by armed soldiers and through files of Federal bayonets fixed and ready to do bloody work at the nod of a usurping governor or at the command of a too willing but still more heartless and cruel major-general, only to be dispersed when fairly congregated and denounced afterward as "outlaws and banditti!" And, as if the cup of our shame and humiliation as a once liberty-loving people was not already filled to the brim by these lawless acts of tyranny and power, men of exalted station and claiming to be lovers of freedom, of law and order, and the champions of popular liberty, are found ready to defend and apologize for such acts of despotism. They seek to justify the President by imputing to him ignorance of any attempt of the soldiery to interfere with the organization of the Legislature, but in their efforts to do so fail to tell the public that Sheridan was in New Orleans three days prior to the outrage committed, and was there by executive direction. He was sent there for some purpose, and that purpose is abundantly manifest and readily to be inferred from his famous "banditti" dispatch to the President.

No plea of ignorance will avail where facts reveal a knowledge of what was to be done and who was to do it. Sheridan was obeying the orders of his Commander-in-Chief, who had dispatched him to New Orleans as a "right bower" to support the usurper Kellogg. He carried with him, in advance of the assembling of the Legislature, by order of his master, the Federal manacles to shackle Louisiana and lay her prostrate beneath the heel of military power. It was he who, from the custom-house, through General Emory and by means of telegraph wires, communicated with the soldiers at the State-house and ordered the putting out of the five members. The conduct of this major-general of "banditti" notoriety cannot be extenuated or justified by anything in the history of Christian civilization, or by any law, human or divine. His name will be handed down through the ages as a cruel, blood-thirsty trooper, and his desire to outlaw a Commonwealth will be a dark chapter in the pages of our history when some future chronicler shall transmit to posterity the deeds of the present.

A sovereign State shackled and bound at the feet of military power, that a usurper may ravish it and the carpet-baggers who, like foul birds of prey, have flocked thither may fasten their filthy beaks in the quivering flesh of a prostrate people; her citizens taxed without representation; her children practically outlawed without the forms of law and in violation of that wise provision of the Constitution which guarantees trial by jury—these are the monuments which testify to the infamy of all who were concerned in the outrage done to liberty.

Mr. Speaker, the question is not at whose instance the soldiers entered the legislative halls, but that they entered at all and under authority of what law. To say it was done because somebody had improperly been elected speaker is not sufficient to justify an invasion of the rights of a sovereign State. If Wiltz and his people in the Legislature had usurped power, the sovereign State of Louisiana was fully able to do justice in the premises and right the wrong without any impertinent intermeddling from outsiders. If we tolerate or countenance such unlawful interposition of Federal power, we strike down the right of local self-government, which is the chief cornerstone of our institutions. It was for this principle our fathers fought, and I am mistaken if their sons are not as jealous of it as they were. The whole country has spoken in unmistakable tones of the great usurpation in Louisiana. We hear it from Boston, the cradle of liberty; from the broad-swelling prairies of the West; from the down-trodden South; and we hear it echoing along the galleries and throughout the halls of this Capitol. Thank God, the people are aroused.

Mr. Speaker, General Sheridan when he arrived in New Orleans, as the whole country knows, telegraphed the Secretary of War asking that the leaders (and by this he no doubt meant the prominent men) be declared "banditti." Yes, he asked that that people, nearly all the prominent men of a sovereign State, be convicted without law or authority, and then forsooth he would, I suppose, with his bold troopers have gone through that State killing and plundering until almost the entire white population would have been destroyed. Did the Christian world ever hear such a proposition? One's blood curdles at the contemplation.

There are times and occasions when the human heart must give utterance. Though I preferred to have been a quiet listener and have heard some voice more eloquent than mine upon this subject, and though I have been a quiet member of this House, I should be recreant to those who sent me here, as well as to myself, were I not to enter my earnest, prayerful protest against the conduct of the Federal officers, troops, and the President in this Louisiana matter. It is natural that the South should feel deeply about this matter. The human heart is full of pride and prejudices; but the people of the South had conquered both. They did all that has been required of them since the war by the Federal Government. They freed the slave; they enfranchised him in obedience to the wishes of the Federal Government; they have cheerfully borne all the burdens of taxation, sometimes without representation. In many instances men who have assessed and collected the largest portion of the taxes are men who never paid a shilling; but under all these circumstances they have shown a fortitude and courage never before shown by any people. Houses have been repaired, fences have been reset, forests have been hewn down, roads constructed, and with good government the country would rapidly improve, as it has in those States and sections where they have been under democratic and conservative rule.

But in addition to the outrages in Louisiana, another State is threatened with annihilation, and Executive power has given the country to understand that its government, established by the voice of a majority of the people, is to be overthrown. False to his former action and unmindful of the fact that by the connivance of Federal power the existing government in the State of Arkansas was called into being, the President of the United States, assuming the power of an autocrat, and confessing that he winked at fraud in recognizing the Baxter government, turns now upon its offspring, like Saturn upon his children, to destroy it. Great God! has it come to this; that a creature of the States is permitted to destroy that which gave him official life! Have we sunk down into the quietism of indifference to liberty and law, that we tamely submit to such acts of despotism? Will the people of the North countenance such bold attempts to enslave a people and strike down liberty? In the name of the Constitution, in behalf of liberty and law, and by all the hallowed memories and associations clustering around the establishment and progress of the Republic, I invoke them to let their condemnation of this last threatened outrage be such as will make executive power and tyranny tremble and pause in its career.

Mr. Speaker, in a few days my congressional life will have closed. I shall, perhaps, never again address this House, but let me beseech you and your people of the North, by the ties of a common ancestry and common destiny, by all we were, and by all we expect to be, for justice and moderation toward the South.

Security of Elections, &c.

SPEECH OF HON. HORACE F. PAGE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875.

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, some of the constitutional luminaries of the opposition, seconded by some feeble lights in our own ranks, have told us that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are merely inhibitions upon the States, and that therefore they confer no authority upon Congress to legislate for equal protection of the laws or the right to vote. I do not belong to the legal fraternity, but I have been consulting some high judicial authority upon this question as to how Congress derives its powers.

Looking over the Constitution as it was before the war for freedom, I find the following:

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.—Constitution of the United States, article 4, section 2, subdivision 3.

This seems also to be merely an inhibition upon the States. It forbids any State legislation interfering with ownership of a fugitive slave. Did this confer power on Congress? If it did, what difficulty is there in finding the same power to legislate under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments? If the Constitution guarantees a right, Congress can enforce that right. It matters not if the guarantee of that right is found only in a clause forbidding the State to interfere with the right. That is a sufficient grant of power to Congress to enact all laws appropriate and necessary for the enforcement of such right.

Without presuming further to tread this path to which I am somewhat unaccustomed, I will cite two authorities of great value which I do not recollect to have seen quoted heretofore. First, I read the following from the opinion of Chief Justice Nelson, then of New York, who subsequently sat for many years as an honored member of the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of Jack and Martin he said, in discussing the fugitive-slave law:

The counsel for the plaintiff in error contends, the mode of making the claim and of delivering up the fugitive is a subject exclusively of State regulation, with which Congress has no right to interfere; and, upon this view, the constitutionality of the law of this State is sought to be sustained.

It is material to look into the object of this clause of the Constitution, the evil to be guarded against, and the nature and character of the rights to be protected and enforced, in order to comprehend its meaning and determine, what powers and to what extent, may be rightfully claimed under it.

At the adoption of the Constitution a small minority of the States had abolished slavery within their limits, either by positive enactment or judicial adjudication; and the Southern States are known to have been more deeply interested in slave labor than those of the North where slavery yet to some extent existed but where it must have been seen it would probably soon disappear. It was natural for that portion of the United States to fear that the latter States might, under the influence of this unhappy and exciting subject, be tempted to adopt a course of legislation that would embarrass the owners pursuing their fugitive slaves, if not discharge them from service and invite escape by affording a place of refuge. They already had some experience of the perplexities in this respect under the Confederation which contained no provision on the subject, and the serious and almost insurmountable difficulties that this species of property occasioned in the convention were well calculated to confirm their strongest apprehensions. To this source must be attributed, no doubt, the provision of the Constitution, and which directly meets the evil; by not only prohibiting the States from enacting any regulations discharging the slave from service, but by directing that he shall be delivered up to the owner; it implies a doubt whether they would, in the exercise of unrestrained power, regard the rights of the owner, or properly protect them by local legislation. The object of the provision being thus palpable, it should receive a construction that will operate most effectually to accomplish the end consistent with the terms of it. This we may reasonably infer will be in accordance with the intent of the makers, and will regard with becoming respect the rights of those especially interested in its execution.

Which power, then, was it intended should be charged with the duty prescribing the mode in which this injunction of the Constitution should be carried into effect and enforcing its execution—the States or Congress? It is very clear if left to the former the great purpose of the provision might be defeated in spite of the Constitution. The States might omit any legislation on the subject, and thereby leave the owner without any known means by which to assert his rights; or they might so encumber and embarrass the prosecution of them as that their legislation on the subject would be tantamount to denial. That all this could not be done or omitted without disregarding the spirit of the Constitution is true; but the provision itself is founded upon the assumption that without it the acknowledged rights of the owners would not be observed or protected; it was made in express terms to guard against a possible act of injustice by the State authorities. The idea that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the regulation of this subject to the States, when the provision itself obviously sprung out of their fears of partial and unjust legislation by the States in respect to it, cannot readily be admitted. It would present an inconsistency of action and an unskillfulness in the adoption of means for the end in view too remarkable to have been overlooked by a much less wise body of men. They must naturally have seen and felt that the spirit apprehended to exist in the States, which made this provision expedient, would be able to frustrate its object in regulating the mode and manner of carrying it into affect; that the remedy of the evil and the security of rights would not be complete unless this power was also vested in the National Government.

This of itself would be an unanswerable argument in support of the power of Congress to legislate for the enforcement of the rights guaranteed by the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments.

My other authority is Chief Justice Story of the United States Supreme Court. In the case of Prigg vs. The State of Pennsylvania that great jurist used the following language:

If, indeed, the Constitution guarantees the right, and if it requires the delivery upon the claim of the owner (as cannot well be doubted) the natural inference certainly is that the National Government is clothed with the appropriate authority and functions to enforce it. The fundamental principle applicable to all cases of this sort would seem to be that where the end is required the means are given; and where the duty is enjoined the ability to perform it is contemplated to exist on the part of the functionaries to whom it is intrusted. The clause is found in the National Constitution and not in that of any State. It does not point out any State functionaries or any State action to carry its provisions into effect. On the contrary, the natural and necessary conclusion is that the National Government is bound, through its own proper departments, legislative, judicial, and executive, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed by the Constitution.

It will probably be found, when we look to the character of the Constitution of the United States itself—the objects which it seeks to attain, the power which it employs, the duties which it enjoins, and the rights which it secures, as well as to the known historical facts that many of its provisions were matters of compromise of opposing interests and opinions—that no uniform rule of interpretation can be applied which may not allow, even if it does not positively demand, many modifications in its application to particular clauses. Perhaps the safest rule of interpretation after all will be found to be to look to the nature and object of the particular powers, duties, rights, with all the light and aid of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed.

I submit that these two citations, if admitted to contain good constitutional law, do positively demonstrate that whenever the Constitution guarantees a right, even in a clause merely inhibitory upon the States, Congress has ample power, and it is its duty to enforce the right by all necessary and appropriate legislation. I have done with that branch of the subject. I could not refrain from saying this much for the power of Congress, reluctant though I was to attempt the discussion of questions which I have not been trained to deal with. It has not been my intention to participate in the discussion of the bill now under consideration, but to vote quietly for some measure that would seem adequate to meet the emergency. But, sir, while I am reluctant to occupy a moment of the few remaining hours of the session, I feel it my duty to say a few words in favor of protecting the rights of citizens in every State, without regard to their political opinions, race, or color.

As much as any one on this floor I regret the necessity for legislation of this kind, but all having the good of the country at heart must see that it is absolutely demanded. The condition of affairs in some of the Southern States, revealed to us by the reports of committees of the House at this and previous sessions, presents a picture both anomalous and startling. In times past neither life nor property has been safe, but both have been wantonly and brutally sacrificed. Yet they have asked us to "let them alone;" "they only wanted time." And they have been let alone. We have given them time, and with what result? Instead of the gleam of daggers aimed only at the hearts of individuals, they are lighting the torch of open war against the Government; and instead of contenting themselves with the destruction of private property, they subvert the government and seize the property of the State itself. Gentlemen on the other side, and I regret to say a few upon this side of the House, tell us these things are not so, and affect to believe what they say. If they are to be taken at their word, with all the evidence before us, I have to say that they either willfully ignore the situation or else are dealing with it in a weak, frivolous, and supercilious manner. There can be no dispute about the facts. They are well attested, and stand out before us like a rock of adamant. They cannot be wiped out by the mere assertion that they do not exist. They must be believed.

There is one right, sir, esteemed above all others by an American citizen—the right of the ballot. Why? Simply because it protects him in his life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and insures to him and his posterity the perpetuity of those inestimable blessings which have never been vouchsafed to any other people. This right has been shamelessly invaded; it has been ruthlessly trampled under foot, and with its fruits is altogether brought to naught.

Sir, without distinction of color, or distinction of any other character, the Constitution, through your means, has guaranteed this right to all the colored people of the South. It was you who snatched them from the humiliation of bondage and invested them with this great right. It is your duty to protect them in its exercise, and the case has arisen and is now before you when that duty is imperative. Not only people of color, but those of your own race and blood, in attempting to carry out in a peaceable and proper manner the laws which you have enacted, have been confronted at the ballot-box with the willing implements of murder. Nor this alone; but they have been foully and brutally murdered in their homes, in their fields, by the wayside, and in the open street while pursuing their legitimate avocations.

I think, sir, if there be any force left in the Government it should take prompt and speedy means to restore to these people the free, untrammeled right to vote.

But they say it is "unconstitutional." Unconstitutional! Methinks I have heard that cry before. Sir, I believe in the Constitution and will go any length to maintain it, and I believe that we should be carefully guarded in all we do lest its sacred provisions should be infringed. But when they tell me that it is unconstitutional to protect the lives, property, and the dearest rights of American citizens wherever they are, I do not believe it. That was the very purpose and intent of the Constitution, and this bill is proposed for that and no other purpose.

I have observed in the history of the legislation of the country that when anything was proposed which affected the States at the South other than giving them money from the public crib, this cry has been uniformly raised. And when, on the other hand, any act was proposed in their interest, however degrading, however subversive of human rights, however flagrantly in violation of the Constitution and all divine and human laws, that cry was never heard. When in 1850 Congress, at their instance, passed the memorable act of September 26—the fugitive-slave law—empowering them to reclaim fugitives from labor wherever they might be found, placing the Federal courts with all their machinery at their disposal, commanding all good citizens to aid and assist them in its prompt and efficient execution, declaring that the testimony of the fugitive should not be admitted in evidence on any hearing, but that the oaths of claimants or their agents, however irresponsible, should be conclusive of their right to reclaim the respondent, and thereupon, after this legal mockery had been concluded, providing that the fugitive should be removed to the place whence he came without any hinderance or molestation from any court, judge, magistrate, of any person whomsoever, did you hear the democratic watchword "unconstitutional" then? Some of the States in and through which fugitives were pursued under that act had never been touched by the foot of a slave, and they had enacted laws expressly forbidding any interference with fugitives from labor within their limits by any persons whomsoever, and made such interference a crime. Where then was the vaunted democratic doctrine of "State rights"? Did the democrats then raise their voices in upholding the laws of Michigan or Massachusetts? No. Did they cry "unconstitutional" then? Not at all. Did they then think that Congress had no power to legislate? Sir, they claimed for it most ample power, and that the free States, at least, had no rights that Congress was bound to respect.

No parallel, however, can be drawn between that act and the one now proposed. They are wholly dissimilar. The former dragged the fugitive back to slavery, while the latter insures to the citizen his freedom and safety in the exercise of his plain, recognized, constitutional rights. And I now invoke the same Constitution in behalf of the freemen of the country that they invoked in behalf of slavey.

And believing that the passage of the bill is demanded by every consideration of justice and humanity, I shall vote for it as it is. Unlike the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I am unwilling to admit or believe that the Constitution of my country is too weak and powerless to protect the rights of its citizens upon its own soil and underneath its own flag. Sir, three hundred thousand of the best men of the country have sacrificed their lives upon the battle-field to protect those rights. We have seen the friends of freedom stricken down in the Senate Chamber; the knife and pistol have been resorted to in this very Hall to beat down the advocates of human rights. One of the most gigantic civil wars known to history has been waged to bind more closely the chains of slavery on the black race. Desolated homes, the widow's weed, the orphan's wail, bear testimony of the sanguinary conflict.

And now, Mr. Speaker, it is time for peace. You said we should have it. You promised to be peaceable and obey the law. I demand that you keep your promise and all will be well. The people of the country are tired of this continued lawlessness. Abandon your attempts to overthrow State governments. Stop your midnight raids. Unmask the villains under the name of "white-leaguers." Lay aside the bowie-knife and pistol and take up the implements of peace. Permit the black man to enjoy his rights. Treat the men you call "scalawags" and "carpet-baggers," simply because they fought for the preservation of the Government, as men who have the right to live among you if they choose to do so, and then, and not till then, will there be peace.

Security of Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. ABRAM COMINGO,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875.

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. COMINGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it necessary to discuss at any great length the provisions of this bill. I have felt from the time it was first brought before the House for consideration that discussion and resistance would prove unavailing, at least so far as the determination of the measure by this body was concerned, and I now perceive nothing whatever that encourages a hope that my first conclusions were erroneous.

Believing this, I ought, perhaps, to content myself with simply protesting against the passage of this bill and recording my vote in the negative when the main question shall be presented, thus placing the responsibility for this most unwarranted and dangerous legislation on those by whom it was originated and by whose votes it will be accomplished should this bill become a law.

But I will briefly examine some of the provisions of the bill, and endeavor to point out some of its objectionable features and present a few of the reasons that induce me to oppose its passage. This I shall endeavor to do, Mr. Speaker, with the utmost fairness and impartiality. I shall do it not as a partisan nor as a democrat, nor for the mere purpose of building up or strenghtening the democratic party, but in good faith as a citizen of our common country and as a representative of a constituency who, like myself, unqualifiedly deprecate and condemn the proposed legislation, believing it to be not only unwarranted by the fundamental law of the land, but unwarranted by the facts which its advocates insist demand it, and unquestionably inimical to the best interests of our country. The avowed and ostensible objects are to prevent the subversion of the authority of the States and maintain the security of elections; but notwithstanding this high-sounding title, no one who is at all familiar with the history of this measure can doubt that its ultimate and chief object is to strengthen and perpetuate the power of the republican party, and enable those who have neither the sympathy nor the respect of the people they represent to maintain themselves in the official positions which they have virtually usurped. Indeed, the Administration organ in this city comes boldly to the front, and declares and publishes to the world that the passage of this bill "is required to preserve to the republican party the electoral vote of the Southern States." This is a frank but a startling confession, and may be regarded as the exponent of the motives and purposes of those who, whether in or out of Congress, favor this extraordinary legislation. It is like the frantic efforts of a drowning man. The cry is, save us or we perish, and save us regardless of consequences to others, and regardless of the restraints imposed by the Constitution on legislative power. Such recklessness, inspired by such motives, cannot fail to appal those who love their country and revere or even respect its Constitution.

I do not, however, insist, Mr. Speaker, on trying and determining the merits of this measure, nor indeed of any other, by the motives that govern those who give it their support. True, these are proper subjects for consideration, but there is always danger that we may give too much importance to them, and may not duly consider the actual and important questions involved. If these are meritorious, or if, in other words, the measure proposed is wise and just, the motives that may control the action of those who give it their support cannot deprive it of these characteristics, nor will they warrant us in refusing to give it our support. The friends of this measure claim that it possesses the virtues of necessity, wisdom, and justice. This is the utmost that can be said in commendation of any proposition; and if it may be truthfully predicated as to this, there is an end to the discussion. But let us examine the provisions of this bill and see to what extent, if to any, it possesses actual merits.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, this bill, together with all kindred legislation that has been effected or attempted this session, is suggestive of impending trouble. View it as you may it presents this unpleasant aspect. If it is necessary to provide against the invasion of the States and prevent the subversion of their authority and maintain the security of elections by such means as are proposed by this measure, it follows that the demoralization of the people is such as to extinguish the hope that we are capable of self-government, and to render it manifest that force has become and that it must henceforth remain an indispensable and the chief agent by which the people are to be controlled and governed. And if, on the other hand, there is, as many of us believe and insist, no actual public necessity or no authority for this legislation, and it is to be forced on the country as a partisan scheme to perpetuate mere party power, the future does not present a more encouraging aspect, nor does it become any less alarming to those who love their country and realize the fact that the liberties of the American citizen are founded upon and must be preserved and regulated by law. These are actual and not imaginary dilemmas, one of which must present itself to the friends of the bill before the House if they are sincere in the support they propose to give it, and the other of which is equally apparent to those who have expressed a determination to prevent, if in our power, the perpetration of so great an outrage on the rights of the people and such an unmistakable infraction of their Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, before any gentleman justifies himself in casting his vote for this measure, he must be able to show, first, that there is an unmistakable public necessity for it; and secondly that it is fully authorized by the provisions of the Constitution he under oath promised to support. This necessity and authority must both exist. The one without the other will not answer; and unless both exist, the proposed legislation may be justly characterized as an act of unmitigated tyranny. The necessity does not exist. It does not appear from the testimony that has been taken by the various committees that have been sent out to investigate the political affairs and actings and doings of the people of the Southern States, and no one pretends that it exists elsewhere; nor was it intended by those who prepared this skillful device of oppression that it should vex and harass any State or section north of Mason and Dixon's line. But the electoral vote of some of these Southern States must be secured for the republican party to prevent the scepter from departing from its hands, and to this end all other considerations must be subordinated and considered lawful.

But, Mr. Speaker, I not only deny that the alleged necessity exists, but I assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that there is not even the shadow of authority for the legislation we are attempting under the guise of this bill.

When we look into the Constitution given us by our fathers, we find a provision that permits, or rather requires, the United States to "protect each of the States against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence." To this extent and no further may the General Government go in its effort to protect a State in our great sisterhood of States; and any and every interference or attempted interference in the domestic affairs of a State that is not clearly within the purview of this authority is a clear usurpation of power, and tends to the ultimate subversion of our political system and the enslavement of the people.

No one pretends, Mr. Speaker, that any one of the States has been invaded or is threatened with invasion, nor is there such domestic violence in any of them that is of such a character as seems to be contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, and against which the latter must afford protection if it is applied for in the manner prescribed in that instrument. If the bill confined the exercise of the power within the limits just mentioned, it would not be objectionable so far as this feature of its provisions is concerned; but it virtually annuls the constitutional limitation on the power and right of the General Government to interfere in State affairs, and makes the Federal authority paramount to all others. The inevitable tendency of the proposed legislation is to the ultimate centralization of power at our Federal capital. Lest this may be pronounced a bug-bear, a mere creation of a distempered imagination, I here submit the text of the entire bill and ask its careful consideration:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall invade any of the States of this Union for the purpose of forcibly overthrowing the existing government of said State, or any constituted authority of the same, or for the purpose of interfering in any forcible or unlawful manner with the due execution of the laws of said State or of the United States; or if two or more persons, within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall conspire with any other person or persons for any of the unlawful purposes hereinbefore recited, with intent to commit the same, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment and confinement at hard labor for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 2. That if two or more persons shall conspire together to overthrow by force or to usurp by violence the State government of any of the States of this Union, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall, in fact, by force and violence attempt to subvert or usurp such State government, or any department thereof; or if any two or more persons shall, by like force and violence, actually overthrow the existing government of any State, or any department thereof, each person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, and shall be imprisoned not less than one year and not more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 3. That any person or persons using or proposing to use fire-arms or other deadly weapons against any peaceable individual or individuals, or assemblages of the same, at or near the place and on the day or days of registration or holding an election for Representatives or Delegates to Congress, for the purpose of intimidating or injuring such individual or individuals while such election is in progress, and before the same shall have been completed, or before such election has commenced to be held for the purpose of intimidating such individuals from coming to the same, shall be guilty of a crime, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $2,000, and imprisoned not less than one year and not more than three years, at the discretion of the court trying the same: Provided, That in all prosecutions under this act, the open or concealed carrying of fire-arms or other deadly weapons at such elections or place of registration, shall be taken as presumptive evidence of the intent to intimidate under this act.

SEC. 4. That in case the registration officers appointed under the laws of any State or Territory, where by the laws of said State or Territory registration is required as a condition of voting at any election for Representatives in Congress, shall willfully or corruptly refuse or neglect to give any persons entitled to vote, at any precinct or voting-place established under the provisions of the laws of Congress, or of any State or Territory, full and sufficient opportunities to register in the manner prescribed by law, and within the time fixed by law, or shall, by any device or subterfuge, impose conditions or enforce discriminations upon voters or classes of voters not declared in such registration laws, or shall refuse or neglect, on request made by the voter or his agent, to furnish such voter with a certificate of registration, or such other form of evidence of the same as may by law be required in such State or Territory, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not less than six months nor more than two years, or both, at the discretion of the court trying the same.

SEC. 5. That any person or persons, who, at any election for a Representative to Congress, shall by cunning or device, fraud or force, take, or cause to be taken, from the legal custodian or custodians of the same, or from any place where kept in deposit by any such custodian or custodians, the box or boxes of ballots, or the poll-lists, or either of them, or shall carry away, conceal, scatter, deface, mutilate, or destroy said ballots or poll-lists, or any or either of them, before the final count and comparison of the same has been completed, and the result of the election ascertained and publicly announced, or before the time has expired for which such ballots and poll-lists, or either of them, have to be preserved under the laws of the United States, or of such State and Territory, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $3,000, and imprisoned not less than two years nor more than five years, at the discretion of the courttrying the same.

SEC. 6. That if in the prosecution of any of the undertakings hereinbefore declared unlawful, or in the commission of any of the offenses hereinbefore set forth, any person not participant in said offenses or unlawful undertakings shall be killed by any persons engaged in the same, or any of them, such killing shall constitute the crime of murder; and any person committing the same, or accessory before the fact to such commission, shall, on conviction thereof, suffer the penalty of death.

SEC. 7. That the district courts of the United States, within their several districts, shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses against the provisions of this act, and also concurrently with the circuit courts of the United States of all causes, civil or criminal, arising under this act, except as herein otherwise provided; and the jurisdiction hereby conferred shall be exercised in conformity with the laws and practice governing United States courts; and all crimes and offenses committed against the provisions of this act may be prosecuted by the indictment of a grand jury, or, in cases of crimes and offenses not infamous, may be, either by indictment or information, filed by the district attorney in a court having jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. That the supervisors of elections hereafter appointed for any county, parish, or voting precinct in any congressional district, at the instance of ten citizens, as provided in existing laws, shall exercise the same powers and perform the same duties as are now given to and required from supervisors in towns and cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. All supervisors of elections within any congressional district may hereafter be appointed from the congressional district; and the judge of the circuit court of the United States within whose circuit such district may be situate shall appoint such supervisors on petition as now provided by law at least thirty days prior to the registration or election in which they are to act; and one of said supervisors, so appointed by said judge, shall be by him denominated as chief supervisor of said congressional district, and shall possess the powers and perform the duties now required by law of a chief supervisor.

SEC. 9. That the provisons of existing laws as to the appointment, powers, and duties of special deputy marshals for cities and towns of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, in elections for Representatives to Congress, are hereby extended to the several counties, parishes, and voting precincts in each congressional district, and such special deputies may be selected from any portion of such congressional district.

SEC. 10. That at all elections for Representatives in Congress hereafter held, the managers of such elections or board of officers charged with the conduct of the said election, by whatever title denominated, at the several polling places, shall immediately after the closing of the polls and before separating or adjourning to any other time or place, count and declare in the presence of the supervisor and deputy marshal, if any shall have been appointed and shall be present at said polling place, the result of the vote polled at said place of election, and shall thereupon immediately certify the same so far as relates to Representatives in Congress or presidential electors, if voted for in said election, under the laws of the State, and shall deliver such certificate to said supervisor or deputy marshal, whichever may be present; and such supervisor or deputy marshal, as the case may be, shall at once transmit such certificate to the chief supervisor of the congressional district, who shall, as soon as practicable, forward the same to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. And the officer or officers charged with the canvassing or consolidation of the vote of any county, city, or parish shall in like manner perform such duty in the presence of such supervisor, if present, who shall, if appointed, attend in each county, city, or parish at the time and place provided by law for such canvass and consolidation.

SEC. 11. That no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation whatever from the United States for his services, nor shall the compensation heretofore allowed by law to any officer already existing be in any manner increased by reason of anything in this act contained.

SEC. 12. That the ballots, poll-lists, tally-sheets, or other papers which by the law of any State are evidence of an election, and which have been used in elections for Representatives to Congress, shall hereafter be preserved and safely kept by the custodian provided by the laws of the several States until the close of the first session of the Congress to be affected by such election; that either party to an election contest in the House of Representatives of the United States, in which contest an allegation of fraudulent count or change of ballots is made, may have a subpœna directed to said custodian, who shall, if so required by said subpœna, produce such original ballots, lists, and other papers connected with said election, and the same, after the usual notice to the contestant or contestee, may be examined and compared before any person in the county or parish authorized to take depositions in contested elections, and such person shall certify under his hand and seal, and forward in the manner provided by law, said examination and comparison to be used as evidence in the case. After said examination and comparison shall be completed, said ballots, lists of voters, and other papers shall be returned to their lawful custodian in the same condition as when by him produced before said examining officer.

SEC. 13. That whenever in any State, or part of a State, the unlawful combinations named in section 5299 of the Revised Statutes, and in the first and second sections of this act, shall be organized and armed, and so numerous and powerful as to be able, by violence, to either overthrow or set at defiance the constituted authorities of said State, and of the United States within said State, or when the constituted authorities are in complicity with, or shall connive at the unlawful purposes of such powerful and armed combinations; and whenever, by reason of either or all of the causes aforesaid, the conviction of such offenders and the preservation of the public safety shall become in such district impracticable, in every such case such combinations shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and, during the continuance of such rebellion, and within the limits of the district which shall be so under the sway thereof, such limits to be prescribed by proclamation, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, when, in his judgment, the public safety shall require it, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to the end that such rebellion may be overthrown: Provided, That all the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, which relate to the discharge of prisoners other than prisoners of war, and to the penalty for refusing to obey the order of the court, shall be in full force so far as the same are applicable to the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the President shall first have made proclamation, as provided by law, commanding such insurgents to disperse.

If these provisions become a law and are rigorously executed, as they may be, and as they certainly will be should it become necessary in the effort to secure the electoral vote of the Southern States, it is not difficult to tell what will remain of State authority or what remaining rights of the States that may be subjected to this rule will thereafter be worth preserving.

But the bill goes still further, and proposes ruthlessly to trample under foot one of the strongest safeguards of personal liberty. In suspending, or rather proposing to suspend, the writ of habeas corpus, the authors of this measure have shown at least that constitutional barriers give them no apparent trouble. They read in the Constitution of their country, in language of unmistakable interpretation, that—

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

They read but heed not this limitation to both legislative and executive power. There can be no controversy as to its meaning. Unless there shall be a rebellion against the lawful authority of the United States, or an actual invasion of her territory, the privilege of this writ cannot be violated without trampling down every principle in the civil liberty of our country. This we are about to do, or at all events this we propose to do, by the terms of this bill, and this I have no doubt we will do. Thus step by step are we approaching the verge of our ultimate ruin; thus, almost imperceptibly, is liberty perishing in our midst, while despotism is placing her children in bondage and binding them with fetters it will take centuries to break. It may be that such apprehensions are unfounded; it may even be that they appear idle and ridiculous to some; but when we look into the history of the recent past, and realize what wonderful strides power has made and is yet making toward centralization; when we hear the mutterings of the spirit of partisan strife and witness the apathy and unconcern of the people, and when we see a political party striving to perpetuate its power by means of artful and pernicious legislation such as is here proposed, our fears cannot be pronounced idle, nor can we too speedily arouse from our slumbers and strive to avert the impending danger.

I do not, Mr. Speaker, charge those with whom I thus disagree with intentional wrong. Men never err nor commit crime intentionally. The end, in their opinion, justifies the means they use; and if disaster results, we are told that party interests demand the sacrifice and it must be made—a proposition so monstrous that it but tends to increase and heighten our dismay. The minority are powerless to prevent these wrongs. They have endeavored to point them out and to present the dangerous tendencies of the policy that seems to control the majority. Having done all in their power in this behalf, and having exhausted all the means they could devise to prevent legislation which they regard and have not hesitated to characterize as pernicious, if not atrocious, they can only submit to the results, and labor in the future, as in the past, to preserve the liberties inherited from the fathers.

Security of Elections.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN B. STORM,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1875.

On the bill (H. R. No. 4745) to provide against the invasion of States, to prevent the subversion of their authority, and to maintain the security of elections.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, a very short time has been afforded to the members of this House for the examination of the report of the committee appointed to examine into the affairs of Alabama: yet that time has been sufficient to satisfy me, and this House, too, I hope, that it is one of the most extraordinary reports ever made to this body.

I do not see how any man could put his signature to such a document; I am at a loss how a man with the education and instincts of a lawyer could give it his sanction. That my colleague [Mr. ALBRIGHT] could have spent the greater part of this session in gathering such a mass of trash and twaddle, and publish it to the world for evidence, pains and surprises me. The strangest of all is, Mr. Speaker, the action recommended by the committee on this report. I am sorry that any American lawyer could so far ignore the genius and spirit of our laws and institutions, which form the basis of our prosperity and greatness, as to lend the sanction of his name to such a measure as the bill now pending.

To protect the privilege of this most sacred writ—the writ of habeas corpus—has been the glory and pride of every great English lawyer for centuries; and no great lawyer in this country has ever failed to raise his voice against any attempt to suspend it except in the spirit and mode provided for in the Constitution.

The bill under consideration reads as if its draughtsman had never read the parliamentary struggle of Great Britain over this writ, running through centuries of her history. No, Mr. Speaker, charity compels me to think that my colleague had nothing to do in drawing this bill. Indeed it has been disclosed in debate that this bill was in existence long before the report was made. It is the work of some more cunning and designing mind. It bears the ear-marks of a distinguished lawyer of the Judiciary Committee. The bill is a monstrosity and an anomaly in our legislation. It is the embodiment of the hate and malignity which have survived our late civil contest. It is the agonizing cry of an expiring party; it is the last effort of the republican party in this House to recover power and to elect Grant a third time. Such a measure deserves to be supported by such a party. It was conceived in a midnight caucus of intolerant partisans whom the people by a storm of indignation and disgust last fall swept from place and power. It is the concentrated essence of all that is mean, hateful, and revengeful in republican politics; it combines all the extreme measures of the civil-rights bills, Ku-Klux acts, enforcement, and reconstruction measures of the last ten years of our history.

Let us, Mr. Speaker, examine some of the features of this hideous measure.

The first section makes it a felony for two or more persons to invade any of the States of this Union for the purpose of forcibly overthrowing them, or for the purpose of interfering in any forcible or unlawful manner with the execution of the laws of the United States, or to conspire to do these acts, and provides a punishment by a fine not exceeding $10,000 and an imprisonment at hard labor for a term not exceeding ten years, at the discretion of the court.

The second section makes it a crime for two or more persons to combine together, or to attempt to overthrow by force, or to usurp by violence, the government of any State, or actually do overthrow the same, or any department thereof, and prescribes a punishment by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 and imprisonment not less than one nor more than twenty years, at the discretion of the court.

The third section makes the use of fire-arms at an election for the purpose of intimidating voters a crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment; and the open or concealed carrying of fire-arms or other deadly weapons at any election or place of registration shall be taken to be presumptive evidence of the intent to intimidate under this act.

The fourth section punishes with fine and imprisonment any violation of the registration laws of Congress or the States and Territories.

The fifth section relates to the custody and control of ballot-boxes, poll-lists, &c., and closes with the usual fine and imprisonment.

The sixth section makes the killing of any person by any one while engaged in the prosecution of the unlawful acts mentioned in the bill murder, and to suffer the penalty of death.

The seventh section gives the district courts of the United States xclusive jurisdiction of the offenses named in the bill.

The eighth section provides for supervisors of election in counties, parishes, and voting precincts to be appointed by the judges of the circuit court of the United States, who are to perform the duties and exercise the same powers as are now required of and given to supervisors in towns and cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward.

The ninth section extends the existing provisions of law relative to special deputy marshals for cities and towns of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward to the several counties, parishes, and voting precincts in each congressional district, and these marshals may be selected from any portion of such district.

The tenth section provides for the time and manner of counting, declaring, and certifying the results of elections.

The eleventh section, which says that no officer whose office is created by this act shall receive any compensation other than heretofore provided by law is a mere dodge to save the bill from a point of order which would have sent it to the Committee of the Whole House, where a fair chance for discussion and amendment would have been afforded.

The twelfth section provides for the preservation of ballots, poll-lists, tally-sheets, and other evidences of election.

The thirteenth section, which is more mischievous than all the others combined, says that the unlawful acts named in section 5299 of the Revised Statutes—which is the third section of the act of April 20, 1871, known as the "enforcement acts," and in sections 1 and 2 of this act—shall be deemed a rebellion against the Government of the United States, and authorizes the President of the United States to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus whenever and wherever he may deem it necessary to do so.

Such are the extraordinary provisions of this bill, stripped of its verbiage and superfluities, and which it is proposed to pass in the expiring hours of a dying Congress, and at a time too when the public mind is agitated about what may be the intentions of the "silent man" at the other end of the avenue with regard to its enforcement; at a time, too, when the air is full of whispers as to the means he is employing to force this bill through before this session closes.

I regard the bill wrong in policy and principle.

It is wrong in policy; for whatever wrongs and irregularities now exist in some portions of the South, they have nearly all been produced by just this kind of pernicious legislation. Instead of this bill removing the evils, it will only aggravate them and make them perpetual.

That there is a condition of affairs in the South that all good men must deplore none can doubt. But the surprise to me is that it is not worse. And I am glad to know that some of the best republicans in this House agree with me in this statement, and among them is the distinguished and patriotic gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] It is with pleasure and pride that I read the able and patriotic speech of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD.] How grand and noble his utterances are when compared to the spread-eagle oratory of his colleague, [Mr. BURROWS,] who is as full of blood and thunder as his speech is of "sound and fury signifying nothing."

Take the best-governed State of the North and subject it to the same course of treatment that the States of the South have been compelled to endure for the last ten years and you would find the same state of things, for human nature is the same in all ages and in all places. The extreme remedies of the Constitution have been too long administered to the South. If this course of treatment is not soon changed the patient will die on our hands.

It is clearly proven by undeniable events that where you have left the people of the South to control their own affairs, without Federal interference, order and good government have been established and maintained, as in Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Texas; and where the Federal Government has continued its interference, as in Louisiana and Alabama, you have disorder and violence; and such will always be the case. I repeat, therefore, that the republican party is responsible for the troubles that afflict the South.

Take any State in the Union, break up the very foundations of its social and political structure; enfranchise the slave and disfranchise the master; deprive the culture, wealth, and talent of a community of the power of legislation and taxation and place that power in the hands of the ignorant and non-property-holding portion; send into such a community a lot of adventurers seeking political power by pandering to and misleading this ignorant population; send to them from the North a few such men as the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] who will sow the seeds of discord between the slave and his former master and fire the heart of the black man by communistic appeals to plunder, rapine, and murder; and, above all, let the Federal Government, through its military President, aided by the Army and Navy and encouraged by an unfaithful Congress and Cabinet, constantly interfere with the domestic concerns of such a State, setting aside its duly elected governor and Legislature and putting in power men to govern and to legislate for the people who were not elected by their votes and have no title to such offices, and then imagine what would be the condition of such a State, what would be the condition of such a people.

Nay, I beseech you, reverse your policy toward the unhappy South. Deal with it as if it was still a portion of our common country, and not a conquered province to be held as Germany to-day holds Alsace and Lorraine.

The measure then is impolitic and ill-timed, and can have no possible good effect.

I also deny, Mr. Speaker, the constitutional right of the Congress to pass this bill. No one has yet pointed out the clause that supports the thirteenth section of this bill. And the burden of showing that fact is with the friends of the measure.

What is this bill, briefly analyzed? It is an attempt by the Congress to create a new kind of invasion and rebellion. Although these terms are well understood by every one possessing ordinary common sense, and are well defined by writers on constitutional and statute laws, yet the bill before us creates a new kind of "invasion" and "rebellion" that no lawyer ever heard of before.

The framer of the bill was astute enough to see that to justify the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus the offenses defined in the first and second sections of the bill must amount to a "rebellion or invasion." This analysis will make the unconstitutionality of the measure manifest to the dullest understanding.

The Constitution provides that—

> The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion and invasion, the public safety may require it.

Rebellion and invasion are the only acts that justify the suspension of the writ, and they must be of such a character as to endanger public safety. The crimes forbidden in the first and second sections of this act and of section 3 of the act of April 20, 1871, must be elevated to the rank of "rebellion" or "invasion;" so that if two persons should "invade" a State for the purpose of overthrowing its government, that is to be deemed a "rebellion" under the thirteenth section of the bill; so if two persons shall conspire to overthrow or usurp a State government, or actually do overthrow or usurp such State government, that is deemed to be by the thirteenth section a "rebellion" against the United States. Is that the kind of rebellion and invasion contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, who weighed every word with the nicest care which they placed in it?

Against such a trifling with words I must protest. It does honor to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] that he opposed this attempt to create a new kind of technical or constructive rebellion and invasion not warranted by the Constitution. That I am not wrong in this view of the case, I can show by a reference to what took place in the various State conventions which had the ratification of the Constitution under consideration. Serious objections were raised to the new Constitution because this clause of the Constitution had no limit as to the time of duration of such suspension. Governor Randolph, of Virginia, met the objection by saying that it "is only suspended in cases of extreme emergency."—Elliot's Debates, volume 3, page 203. And Judge Dana, of the Massachusetts convention, replied to the objection by saying:

> The safest and best restriction arises from the nature of the cases in which Congress are authorized to exercise that power at all, namely, in those of rebellion and invasion. These are clear and certain terms, facts of public notoriety, and whenever these shall cease to exist, the suspension of the writ must necessarily cease also.—Elliot's Debates, volume 2, page 108.

When you come to the application of this act to supposable cases its absurdity becomes manifest. If two men should "invade" the State of Pennsylvania from the State of New York for the purpose of resisting a sheriff in the execution of a writ, such an offense would amount to an "invasion" under the first section of the bill, and when you reach the thirteenth section it becomes a rebellion against the Government of the United States! Could absurdity go further?

Section thirteen says when the combinations mentioned in the first and second sections "become too numerous and powerful," &c., it is a "rebellion." But I beg the gentlemen of the committee to remember that the first and second sections say that two are "numerous" enough to commit the offense.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the seventh section of the bill, which gives the Federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of the offenses named in the bill. This section strikes at the very roots of our federal system. The life of that system is that in its legislative, executive, and judicial departments it leaves to the States the management and control of their local affairs, and the States in their turn have left to the minor municipal divisions of their territory the management of all affairs still more local in their character. Thus in the distribution of power under the Federal Constitution the classes of cases which the Constitution reserved for adjudication in the Federal courts are clearly enumerated. And they are of that class of cases only which either directly appertain to the inherent exercise of national sovereignty, or where disputes might arise between States or between citizens of different States, &c., and the want of a common arbiter or an impartial one was to be met. But by the Constitution the Federal courts could have no exclusive jurisdiction over crimes except they were offenses committed on the high seas, in dock-yards, &c., or in such place as might subsequently become the seat of government, not exceeding ten miles square. The idea of the Federal Government taking cognizance of offenses against the laws of a State never entered the brain of the wildest federalist in the worst days of loose construction.

Our present system of State and Federal jurisprudence has stood the test of eighty years and upward, and its excellence has been admitted by all. All the States have their county and district courts, which hear and try all causes, criminal and civil, arising within the county, district, or parish. These municipal subdivisions of the State are usually small, so that wrongs can be redressed without great expense or delay to the parties. The jurors, witnesses, and parties are near the seat of justice. From these inferior tribunals appeals and writs of error are taken to a higher or supreme court, the court of final appeal in the State. The bill under consideration proposes to take from these local and convenient courts in the State all jurisdiction in a large class of cases that may arise under this act, and to give the district court of the United States exclusive jurisdiction. So that jurors will have to be summoned from distant parts of the State; the parties with their witnesses will have to travel in many cases two and three hundred miles to attend the trial, so that in many cases where the defendant is poor, and perhaps in jail, it will amount to an absolute denial of justice. Thus the costs of the Department of Justice will be fearfully increased for fees to marshals and jurors, justice will be denied, and the unity and perfection of our excellent system of judicature partially destroyed, and nothing gained by it in the end.

Again, the machinery of these courts will be in the main political; the judge and jury being in most cases partisan, and the district attorney and marshal always, any man can well imagine what work they will make of political offenses—the class of cases that will most frequently come before them. When I recollect, too, the kind of men who have been called upon to fill the position of district judge, in the South, my apprehension of evil is increased.

This bill will become, if passed, a fearful instrument of oppression. The bill provides that all crimes and offenses not infamous may be prosecuted either by indictment or information filed by the district attorney. The ignorant black man of the South for light and trivial offenses; for "ostracism," of which we have heard so much, may, by the aid of the district attorney, or by the instigation of that class of men whose only mission in the South seems to be to create trouble and disputes between the races, use this act to annoy and harass his political antagonist. He may have him arrested and held for trial, and the defendant, after bringing his witnesses two or three hundred miles at great expense to meet the issue, finds the case has been discontinued. It is a fact that under the Ku-Klux act not ten in one hundred that were arrested were ever tried. The arrests were made out of sheer political spite and to annoy the persons arrested. Such will be the case under this bill.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I would not place the power to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in the hands of the best man that ever lived. I do not think we have the right to place it in the hands of the Executive. It is a trust committed to Congress by the people through the Constitution, and that trust cannot be delegated. But when it is asked to place the suspension of the privilege of this writ in the hands of the present Executive, the thought of doing so is repugnant to every man who desires to see the liberties of his country protected and maintained. The President is not a statesman of either learning or ability; he is a military man with the instincts and training of a soldier. With him the sword is mightier than the pen, the bayonet more efficacious than the law. And when we consider that the man who is to wield this power for the next two years is aspiring to a third term of the Presidency, and that it is intended to place the entire South at his feet, the proposition becomes startling; and I can say in the language you employed the other night, Mr. Speaker, when a few desperate men in this House ask you to trample all law, constitutional and parliamentary, under your feet, "We are standing on the brink of a volcano."

The South faithful to her duties.

SPEECH OF HON. MATT W. RANSOM,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 17, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana—

Mr. RANSOM said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: After the long and anxious night we have passed, the light of morning pours through the eastern windows of the Capitol. I trust it is the auspicious dawn of a brighter day for the Republic. I approach this debate with extreme anxiety. Never before did I feel so deeply the want of those great abilities that can assert and vindicate the truth; for never before were questions of profounder magnitude presented to the American Senate.

For nearly three years I have sat silently in this Chamber, with the hope that by pursuing a course, as I thought, of impartial and patriotic duty toward all and every part of the country, I might have some influence in satisfying northern Senators that the South desired peace with the North and a restored and fraternal Union of all the States of the Republic. I came from the true State of North Carolina to the Senate of the United States with a sacred purpose to reconcile the once divided people of my country, to harmonize all sectional differences and disputes, to bury in oblivion every bitter recollection of war, and to convince the people of the North that our people of the South sincerely desired to live with them in concord under the common protection of a constitutional and united Government. Before this greatest and best desire of my life, the desire of having a part in restoring the Union of the States firmly in the hearts of all our people, all other passions sank into insignificance. This was the great object of my political existence. To accomplish it, no sacrifice seemed too dear, except the dishonor of my State and the South. I knew this inestimable blessing to my country could only be consummated by our doing full justice to the North and by the North doing full justice to us, and I had faith that both sections would be equal to that great duty. If this faith was right, I saw for my country the grandest destiny upon earth; if it was false, I beheld in the future nothing but appalling darkness. For, unless this Union is based upon the foundations of justice and the affections of all the people, nothing but force can maintain it; and a Union habitually supported by force ceases to be a free government and becomes a despotism, the stronger and the sterner in proportion to the extent of territory and the magnitude of the interests it dominates. I had too, and still have, this thought, one that to many of you may appear strange and unnatural, but still sincere and true and ardently cultivated in my bosom, that as I had fought for the South and its cause had failed and the Union had been established, it became me as a true man to render to the Government of my country, now embraced by me, the same devotion—for I could have no greater—that I had exhibited to the South.

With these sentiments, Mr. President, I took the oath of office on the right of the chair which you now occupy. With any others in my breast I never would have taken a seat in this Chamber. I felt the pride of a man when these thoughts stirred within me. I knew that they did not lessen in any sense my duty, my love, my very soul for the people of the South. I felt that these sentiments were compatible with their highest honor, and that in entertaining and acting upon them here I but represented their own generous and patriotic sensibility. I knew we had passed a dark and stormy night, but I also knew that political justice was the great element which, like the sun in the morning, would dispel from the hearts of our people every cloud and memory of the tempest.

With these convictions I have thought most anxiously, day and night, upon my duty since the commencement of this debate. It is true I have had no doubt at any time—I could not possibly have a doubt—as to the character of the events that have transpired at New Orleans. Unless the lessons of human history and the principles of free government had been suddenly eclipsed in my judgment, I could have on that subject but one opinion. But my anxiety has been in reference to the right course for me to pursue in meeting the issues that have arisen in this discussion. I have considered that subject with the deepest concern. I have devoted to it the best thought I possess. I have brought to it as pure patriotism as I can feel, and I am profoundly thankful that a paramount regard for the purposes which I have declared to animate me as a Senator imperatively commands me not to depart a hair's breadth from the line of those purposes in consequence of any of the provocations given in this discussion. Acting under this high duty, I feel that I owe it to the noble State that honors me with her confidence, to the people of the South who have my sympathy and affection, and to the country at whose altars I minister, to surrender the natural and just resentments excited by unprovoked assaults of a personal and sectional character, as another offering to the peace of my country, and to speak this day without passion or prejudice for the safety and honor of the nation. Yes, sir, I am thankful, profoundly thankful that my wish for harmony is too deeply cherished, my resolution to reconcile and restore too firmly fixed. to be shaken by unjust utterances here or elsewhere.

If at any time during the progress of this debate an intelligent stranger had entered this Chamber and listened to the speeches of republican Senators he would have been profoundly impressed with their statements in reference to the South. Hearing the repeated accusations that that people were ruthlessly violating every principle of justice and humanity, that their hands were red with innocent blood, and that they were organizing a conspiracy to subvert by armed force the authority of the National Government and to establish a revolution on its ruins, he would naturally have been shocked at the startling enormity of the charge and in all probability would examine the foundations upon which it was based. Inquiring into the history, condition, intelligence, and character of this denounced people, he would behold them numbering eight million beings, occupying a territory that extends from the Potomac and the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic Ocean across the great Mississippi to the very boundaries of civilization, embracing in its area twelve States, subdivided into more than a thousand counties. All over these States he would see public and private schools, seminaries of learning, colleges and universities. Throughout their length and breadth are the churches and the altars of all religious denominations. Long and frequent lines of railroads permeate and traverse every portion of their surface. The United States mails are distributed throughout every township in their limits. The press of the country, that great luminary which, with the sun, scatters its daily beams over the world, penetrates with diversified and opposing rays every corner of this vast domain. The lines of the electric telegraph flash intelligence to all the people. The great highways of commerce unite all their interest with the North and the world. Visitors by thousands from the East, the North, and the West, for curiosity, for health, or profit daily cross their lines and pass over their country. Tourists from Europe, attracted by the climate and interested in the history of the people, linger among the beautiful scenes of nature or visit the shrines and spots in that stricken land that are consecrated to deathless fame. The earnest seeker for truth would fail to find in any of these incidents cause for or proof of a dark and hidden conspiracy greater in proportion, but not less damning in its character, than the accursed conception which made the name of Catiline an immortal infamy.

Mr. President, not in India, not in South America, not in Mexico, not in Jamaica, not in Rome in the last and bloodiest days of her decline, not in lawless and impious modern Italy, has there ever been found a people so lost, so blind, so callous to every sense of justice and humanity as the people of the South are, if one-half that has been charged in this Chamber be true. And yet we behold that people surrounded by and possessed of all the incidents of the highest type of civilization.

If Senators will examine their own hearts, if they will weigh this question with calm judgment, they will find that they have deceived themselves. They will find that they express what in their deepest convictions they do not feel.

I do not intend to irritate or to give offense in what I shall say here. If any person thinks so he mistakes me. I wish to pour oil on these troubled waters. I desire to heal these wounds. I seek to cure this malady. I do not intend to aggravate or continue it. I am speaking to-day with all the solemnity of a man who defends a great people, and if I should utter one word that might retard, or prevent, or in any way hinder a thorough reconciliation between the sections, I should deplore the day that I was born. I ask Senators now to think with me on this question. It has been a custom in this Senate—which is the most deliberate, the most courteous, the most refined, the most exalted legislative body upon the earth, where every propriety of speech, every courtesy of manner, every sentiment of duty is strictly observed, where Senators are tender of the feelings of brother Senators—to speak of the southern people as traitors, as red-handed murderers, as stained with barbarism, as having attempted the darkest and the bloodiest horror in human history. Senators, it is but just to you for me to say that when you so speak you do not utter your own convictions. You are obliged to say you do not in justice to yourselves. For if you think that the southern people, eight millions of them, the leaders of them, are traitors, murderers, and assassins, how dare you, in the light of your duty to your country, to your families, and to your God, consent to embrace them as countrymen and brothers? You did not believe it; you do not believe it. You know you do not believe it.

Perhaps there is something in the history of this southern people that justifies this frightful suspicion and fills the minds of Senators with alarm and dread. That cannot be. For they are the children of the brave English ancestors who for love of civil and religious liberty left the shores of Europe and settled the New World. They are the immediate descendants of the bold and wise men who helped to establish American independence and to frame this grand and magnificent Government. Their illustrious fathers have certainly handed down to them the passion for liberty and the principle of constitutional freedom. We have inherited it for eight hundred years from our ancestors; but those ancestors have not transmitted any taint of or example for secret treasons. In the English heart the spirit of conspiracy never found a congenial home. It is the growth of other soils. But have not recent events, you will say, furnished reasonable grounds for these apprehensions of a secret colossal organization hostile to the Government? Has not the South just emerged from a gigantic war which menaced the very existence of the Union? That is very true; but remember that it was open, bold, defiant war—threatened for years, proclaimed here, published to the world; declared by the press, from the pulpit, and the hustings; the opinion of mankind and the blessings of Heaven invoked in its behalf, and the lives of a people offered to vindicate its justice. It was no concealed, hidden, mysterious, masked conspiracy. Had it been, never, never could it have enlisted the devoted hearts of the noble people who sacrificed everything but honor around its shrine. Its purposes were spoken here; they were never concealed or denied. Its councils were in the light of heaven. Its lines of battle stretched across the continent. Brave hearts in broad day were its defenses, and around it clustered the hopes and pride of a pure and patriotic people. Are courage, truth, honor, constancy, fortitude, and unsullied virtue evidences that the people who possess them will descend from that high estate, and, forgetful of all duty, resort to the lowest practices of cowardice and crime? If this be true, human character is indeed worthless, national honor a mockery and an imposture.

Senators, if you will think for a moment; if you will reflect upon the character of the people whom you denounce, their history, their associations, the language they speak, their great ancestors, their brotherhood with you for nearly a century, and their position now, you cannot believe this calumny. Do you, can you, believe that a people from whom have sprung in each succeeding generation for one hundred years a line of statesmen, divines, scholars, and heroes inferior to none in any portion of the Union have suddenly descended under the shadow of your civilization to the depth of barbarism? Does history or human experience justify any such conclusion?

And yet you call now upon the public opinion of the world to believe that one-half of your whole nation, brothers in blood with you, sharers of the same inheritance of our fathers, honored American freemen, educated, virtuous, and associated with you—you call upon the world to believe that they are now guilty and habitually guilty of darker crimes than have ever been committed in human history. And instead of devoting our energies, our patriotism, our intelligence, and our virtues here to develop, reform, and improve this great country, we are now carrying on a war on the floor of the Senate with each other almost as bitter, and I fear not quite as manly, as that in which we were engaged a few years ago upon the Potomac and the Susquehanna.

Senators this is wrong. Before God, it is wicked. Cannot we stop it? An incident in history occurs to me now which I do not know that I have thought of for twenty years. I remember the story, told I think by Thucydides, of the two Greek generals who had not spoken for years. A bitter and hereditary feud separated them. The Persians were at the gates of Athens. The lines of battle were drawn in front of the city. The Persian hosts, vastly superior in number, confronted the thin line of the Greeks, and the great fear with the city was that the dissension between the two generals might cause defeat and ruin. Just before the battle commenced, the historian says, from either wing of the Greek lines the rival leaders were seen approaching in front of their troops, and simultaneously reaching the center impulsively seized each other's hands and exclaimed—I remember the old Greek words—Καταβαπτῶμεν χολήν—"Let us bury our anger." Need I repeat that victory shone upon that godlike act of patriotism?

They buried their anger; and why cannot you and I, the North and the South, shake hands and bury our anger? I think I know the South. I was born south of the Potomac. My ancestors have lived there for two hundred years. I was raised there; I was educated there. I hardly know any other place. Everything I have is there. I love her people and am with them. I see them at home. I see them in Louisiana. I see them in Texas. I know them in Virginia. I am in the very bosom of the South, and I think the sentiment that I utter here to-day is the sentiment of her people. I do not think—I know it is their sentiment.

Mr. President, the charge made on this floor that the "expression and operation of Union sentiments from southern representatives are confined to this Chamber, that one set of opinions prevail in the Senate and another at home," is as absurd as unjust. The telegraph takes the words from your lips if they are worthy to go, and bears them immediately to the Gulf. The RECORD carries them all over the country. And every Senator understands as well as I do--you, Mr. President, understand it perfectly, and I say it in no disparagement; it is what every public man ought to understand, it is what every public man ought to appreciate—you know that public men are not apt to avow sentiments that they suppose to be unpopular at home. If the Senate will pardon me, as this imputation has been made by two Senators in this debate and may have some weight, I will ask the Clerk to read the extract on the first page of the book I send to him.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I thank God there are flowers enough in this beautiful land of the South to strew upon the graves of those who fell alike in the Gray and the Blue, and there are hearts pure and large enough and hands gentle and generous enough to perform the holy duty.

Mr. RANSOM. In May, 1870, I was honored by the ladies of North Carolina with a request to deliver a memorial address over the confederate dead in the capital of the State. And before thousands of our people I felt it my duty at that time, five years ago, to utter those sentiments.

Mr. President, can it be said that the operation and influence of Union sentiments are confined to the Senate Chamber? I know the Senate will pardon me, for there is nothing like making a clean breast when you want to bring conviction. I spoke those words when the ink was not dry upon the paper which proclaimed to the southern people that their friends had not been allowed to honor the graves of the confederate soldiers at Arlington!

I knew very well that day's injustice had consecrated a sorrow to immortality. I knew that as long as letters and language endured, whenever the good read of that act, their hearts in tender thought would go to the heights of Arlington and in imagination scatter upon those bleak graves with the tears of sympathy the immortelles of affection.

I will be obliged to the Clerk if he will read a protion of the paragraph in the second column of the paper which I send to the desk. It is in reference to a speech delivered by me in Salisbury, North Carolina, two years ago—since I have been in the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On this ground the speaker foresaw the early return of a day of thorough reconciliation between the sections lately engaged in deadly conflict and still estranged by the yet lingering passion kindled by the war and kept alive by the arts of the demagogue. He could see the returning sense of justice, the growth of a more fraternal feeling, and a consciousness of mutual dependence and co-operation for the grand purpose of building up and maintaining the mighty nation it seemed the purpose of Providence to have founded.

* * * * * * *

It was a speech for the nation to hear, for it was so full of wise counsel and hopeful suggestion that its influence would be most happily felt in allaying sectional animosities and kindling afresh the fire of a common patriotism.

Mr. RANSOM. That is the comment of a leading newspaper upon a feeble effort made in that part of North Carolina known as the rebellious section of the State. The character of that people in the American Revolution won from Colonel Tarlton of the British army the expression that it was the "Hornet's-nest of America." I think that I would have spoken those sentiments had they cost me my popularity, had they cost me my position; but you see what the newspaper says about them, and papers generally reflect public opinion. Mr. President, may I say that my presence here to-day is the best proof that these sentiments are approved by the people of my State?

But, Mr. President, I hope you will pardon me for another personal allusion. I do not make these allusions as affecting me. I speak of them as the expressions of a representative of his State. One of my first acts in this body, one of the first places in which my name appears upon the record, is where I was appointed on the committee of conference with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] There was a disagreement between the Senate and the House upon an amendment appropriating about a million dollars to erect permanent and durable monuments over the graves of Union soldiers. The amendment was attached to the Army appropriation bill by the Senate. I remember well telling my friend from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] what my course would be on it. The Senator from Louisiana is in his seat and I know he will say that I was the first and last man to enforce the adoption of that amendment. I received the thanks of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the thanks of the Senator from Louisiana, and of a gallant Union general of the House; and that is the cause of my being at present on the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate of the United States. I felt it to be my duty as an American Senator, as a patriot, to give that vote, although I knew that a hundred thousand of the bravest and truest men who ever walked the earth, my comrades in arms, lay buried from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, almost without a stone to mark their graves from the common dust. When did the Senator from Indiana manifest more constancy to the Union? But let me not be misunderstood. I did not think that I dishonored or sullied the memory or the ashes of my dead comrades by that deed. If I had I would have seen the stars torn from their beautiful spheres before I would have consented to an act that was unjust to their great virtues and character; and you would not have respected me if I had.

Senators, when that cause expired the soldiers of the southern armies, following the example of their great leader, laid down their arms and with their arms their hostilities to the Union forever. Never were truer words spoken than when General Grant said at the close of the war just after the surrender—I read from his report:

General Lee's great influence throughout the whole South caused his example to be followed, and to-day the result is that the armies lately under his leadership are at their homes, desiring peace and quiet, and their arms are in the hands of our ordnance officers.

There is the testimony of a soldier and of your President to the disposition and to the conduct of southern soldiers after the war. Let those who sometimes throw out taunts about our courage see what he who had a right to speak said about us. The concluding lines of General Grant's report are as follows:

Let them hope—

Meaning the northern soldiers—for perpetual peace and harmony with that enemy, whose manhood, however mistaken the cause, drew forth such herculean deeds of valor.

The swords that were then sheathed, the muskets that were then grounded, were never again to be lifted against the nation; and, further, I must say—God forgive me if I am wrong in saying it—the swords that were then victorious, the bayonets that were then bright with triumph, should never, never have been used against the liberties of those who had laid down their arms.

Nor can I furnish any better evidence of the condition and the temper of the southern people after the war than this extract from General Grant's report, made upon the state of the South some months after the surrender:

I am satisfied that the mass of thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. The questions which have heretofore divided the sentiment of the people of the two sections—slavery and State rights, or the right of a State to secede from the Union—they regard as having been settled forever by the highest tribunal—arms—that man can resort to. I was pleased to learn from the leading men whom I met that they not only accepted the decision arrived at as final, but, now that the smoke of battle has cleared away and time has been given for reflection, that this decision has been a fortunate one for the whole country, they receiving like benefits from it with those who opposed them in the field and in the council.

My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course were pointed out they would pursue it in good faith. It is to be regretted that there cannot be a greater commingling at this time between the citizens of the two sections, and particularly of those intrusted with the law-making power.

In some instances, I am sorry to say, the freedman's mind does not seem to be disabused of the idea that a freedman has the right to live without care or provision for the future. The effect of the belief in division of lands is idleness and accumulation in camps, towns, and cities. In such cases I think it will be found that vice and disease will tend to the extermination or great reduction of the colored race. It cannot be expected that the opinions held by them at the South for years can be changed in a day, and therefore the freedmen require for a few years not only laws to protect them, but the fostering care of those who will give them good counsel and on whom they rely.

In these words of General Grant will be found a conclusive answer to many of the accusations that are now brought against our people.

I was not present when the discussion took place between my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] and the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS;] I did not hear the Senator when he alluded to the name of General Lee. I regret that I did not, and for a very different reason from what that Senator may suppose. The mention of that name, Mr. President, can never give me anything but pleasure. If for a moment at any time in this debate I had lost sight of my duty; if I had permitted personal resentment and sectional passions to obscure the path I should tread; if I had forgotten the high character that should attach to a Senator of my country, let me assure the Senator that he could have mentioned no name with more talismanic power to bring me back to the line of my own and my country's honor. The very memory of the name of Lee now reminds me that this is not the place nor the time to vindicate a life that has passed to the tribunal of history; but I will say that name now inspires me with higher and purer devotion to my country. It elevates me above sectional lines, it lifts me over local and temporary prejudices, it animates me to embrace the nation in the sentiment of patriotism, and it commands me to be constant in laboring to unite the American people. Far from feeling any mortification at the Senator's allusion, I thank him for presenting to my mind an image of transcendent virtue, which can never cease to excite my highest aspirations for excellence.

Mr. President, there was not a soldier in the Army of the Potomac who did not render to that grand impersonation of courage, dignity, virtue, and manly and Christian grace the homage of a soldier's respect. It was my fortune at Appomattox Court House to see General Lee and General Grant side by side. That scene can never fade from my memory. I see them now as they then stood. I remember both—the one for his majestic serenity under defeat, the other for his quiet magnanimity in victory; qualities which, if exercised by the American people, would long since have restored every heart within its limits to affection for the Union.

But, what is there in the condition of the South upon which a probable or possible ground for the charge of hostility to the national authority can rest? Where is the motive for it to be located? What result is it expected to accomplish? With what reason could it be presented to the people of the South? Where is the argument, the inducement, the incitement to such peril? The slaves are free, and no intelligent human being at the South would see them return to bondage. Is that the truth? I speak it here to-day when the clock is at sixteen minutes after ten in the face of the American Senate, and the people from the Potomac down to Mexico will read it. Their rights to citizenship and the ballot are immutably secured—fixed as firmly as the foundations of the Government. They are sacredly and inviolately intrenched in the Constitution, and can only perish with American liberty. The idea of secession does not exist; it expired with the war; it is buried, and for it there is no resurrection. The Union is established permanently, perpetually, indissolubly, and nowhere in the South is there a desire that it should be impaired.

Disunion has ceased to be a word in our language; it has dissolved, it has vanished, it has gone; no trace of it is left. Until I heard it in this debate my ear has not caught that sound since the roar of the cannon was hushed. I hope never to hear it again. Its echoes will never come up from the South. I pray and believe that it is obliterated, extinguished, annihilated forever. What possible, conceivable interest can the South have in war or in revolution? I hope Senators will put that question to themselves and as reasonable men ask what interest can we have in war or revolution. What has the South to gain? Nay, what has she not to lose by it? Where are her resources for the conflict? Have Senators reflected that more than one-half of all the subsistence now consumed by the South is purchased from the North? There is not meat enough in the Southern States to feed Lee's army sixty days. Where are the preparations and provisions for war? Is not our whole trade conducted with the North? We have no direct trade with Europe. In the event of civil war—and, Mr. President, you have considered this question well—what would become of our cotton crop, the great and only resource of the South, now worth over $200,000,000 annually? Shut up by blockade within our lines, it would be valueless. Where would we find our markets—from whence derive our supplies? As long as we are at peace and in the Union we have friends and supporters at the North, but the moment we lift our hands against the Government or bring on civil war we know that the whole North would be united to crush us. Sir, peace is the only safety and hope of the South. War knows no laws, and if we were again madly to rush to arms, how long would it be before one-third of our population would be armed and arrayed against us and our wives and children exposed to the dangers of savage cruelty? The people of the South shrink from civil war with unutterable horror. They would regard it as the direst calamity that ever cursed a people. They can see nothing in it but imbittered and intenser ruin. They desire, they seek, they cultivate peace; their duty is peace, their prosperity is peace, their honor is peace, their liberty is peace, their aspiration is peace; and there is no intelligent, thoughtful man in the South who does not comprehend it.

Senators cannot believe seriously what they say. Danger of convulsion, revolution, civil war, the overthrow of the Government! If they so think, let me assure them that the serious business men of this country and of Europe do not sympathize in their panic. If, these fears, these dangers were real, if they had any foundation, I think you would find American securities tumbling rapidly downward. You would see gold advance with unprecedented excitement. You would behold the merchants and manufacturers and traders of the North rushing wildly to the South to gather up their imperiled credits. The universal repose of all business interests in this country, our credit at home and in foreign countries, the habitual communications of trade in all its branches between the North and South, all refute and condemn this wild cry of alarm. I am gratified to see that the panic of the Senate has not reached Wall street, nor Paris, nor London, nor Berlin, nor the thoughtful, sober business men of this country. For once the politicians are more sensitive than the capitalists. During the unhppy conflict betweena the sections the Government kept constantly in the field to meet the contending forces of the South over a half million soldiers trained to war. The shock of the conflict made the earth tremble and now we see the whole people of the South, whose forces resisted the power of the Government for four years, kept quiet by not more than two thousand men distributed over half the country.

Will any Senator deny, if these statements were true, that this people who are so shamefully calumniated as abandoned, desperate, and fatally hostile to the Government could sweep every vestige of Federal authority in the South from existence in a month? Is not the national authority maintained in absolute supremacy in every part of the Southern States? Is not the presence of the American flag everywhere respected? Did not the rebellion of Penn in Louisiana, bristling, as has been charged, with fiery war, retire and disarm itself upon the first appearance of national authority? Where is the menace, the peril to the nation's peace in all this? What kind of opposition, of hostility, of danger to the Government and the laws of the country is that which now for ten years has not once raised its voice or lifted its hand against their authority? Will Senators tell me what interest the southern people can have in separation from the North or in the disturbance and upheaval of the Government, that they should contemplate these results? That fatal effort has cost us the loss of untold millions, the lives of our best sons, years of anguish and suffering, and now casts dark shadows far, far into the future. Is it supposed that we are blind, stupid, infatuated enough to fancy that we can consummate by subtle and insidious subterfuges, by secret and occult societies, by unlawful, skulking combinations, by expert and hateful wiles, what we signally failed to accomplish by a common, united, determined, manly struggle of all our people when we had faith and invoked the blessing of God upon our arms?

Do Senators know so little of the character of the southern people as to imagine that they surrendered their armies and submitted to the nation's power until they exhausted every resource, gave up every hope, and abandoned every purpose of resistance? Can any one believe that that proud, brave, generous people, capable of every manly and honorable sacrifice, cherishing the jewel of their honor with more than eastern idolatry, now, when they have nothing left but its unstained sentiment, would ever consent to sully and tarnish for the gratification of base prejudices, of unjust resentments, of cruel hatreds, the name they have kept so bright? They know little, they know nothing of our proud manhood, who can think that the South would surrender its inheritance of valor, truth, and uncalculating honor to any consideration, to any passion beneath it. When they returned to the Union, when they renewed their loyalty to the Government, they embraced it as a duty and nobly conceived that their highest glory lay in maintaining their faith without a blemish. But, thank Heaven, to prove their truth to this faith they have not, they never can think it necessary, they can never think it right to disown, to repudiate, to dishonor the principles that once animated their hearts. Upon the altars of their country, for peace and with the hope of liberty, they have burned their passions, their prejudices, their policies; but their sacred memories, their hallowed affections, their holy duties to their past, they still cherish with increased devotion.

Mr. President, what interest has the South in further disturbance, hostility, agitation? Do not the great rivers of commerce flow through both sections? They cannot be divided. Do not the great railway lines bind us in links of iron and bonds of interest together? Do we not hope to see the rich streams of your wealth flow down to our beautiful but desolated fields? Do we not desire your support and defense against foreign dangers? Do we not ardently, prayerfully desire harmony, peace, fraternal peace, with you as neighbors and as brothers? Can you think after fifteen years of war, suffering, agony, and torture the South does not long for repose, tranquillity, and the subsidence of the bitter waters of strife? Let the last messenger from that sad ark bring back to us the green leaves of hope.

Is it not enough for atonement, is it not enough for all ends, that we have surrendered to necessities $3,000,000,000 in slave property, that we have lost $3,000,000,000 more in other values? These are not my estimates. They are the estimates of the committee which in 1872 went to the Southern States to inquire into their condition. Is it not enough that our recent slaves are now our political equals; that we have been "steeped in poverty to the very lips;" that our "utmost hopes have been given to captivity;" that we have been tried with every affliction; that our bosoms are brimful of sorrow? And still we have found in our souls some drops of patience. What greater sacrifice is required? I know of none other that we can make, unless it be base and abject submission to unlawful power and the confession before mankind that we are unworthy the name of men, and are ready to kiss the rod and the feet that smite and oppress us. Senators, this can never be. We cannot, we will not do this. We will not consent to our own degradation—never, never. We would be unworthy associates, we would not be fit to breathe the free air of a republic, if we would consent to it; and there is not an honest man or a good woman under the sun who would respect us for a moment if we could consent to it.

Will you penetrate our hearts, and undertake to eradicate from them the sentiments and feelings of education and association? Will you thrust your hands into our bosoms, and tear from them the images impressed there by our fathers and our mothers? Will you enter the chambers of the mind, to uproot its convictions and strike from its tablets the very memory of long-cherished opinions? No, Senators, this must be the work of time, the slow process of experience. The human head and heart are not material; you cannot change them as you do the grounds and the scenery around the Capitol. God has planted in them his laws of truth and duty, and they can be erased only by reason and time. Do not drive the South to the terrible alternative of despotism or anarchy. Do not present that deadly dilemma, with its double ruin, to our people—

> Which way I turn is hell—
> * * *
> And in the lowest deep a lower deep still > Threatening to devour me, opens wide
> To which the hell I suffer seems a heaven.

How long can the North survive the slavery and ruin of the South? This country cannot endure with one-half of its limbs and body paralyzed and decaying. The genius of ancient Greece was taxed to invent the most cruel and appropriate punishment for the murderer who had slain his own brother. The unhappy felon was doomed to have the dead body of his victim chained to his own living limbs and to carry the frightful burden wherever he moved. The penalty was greater than the crime. The wretched and accursed fratricide found relief only in death by contagion from the mortified corpse to which he was fastened. And such would be the fate, the just fate, of the Northern States if they should persist in the unnatural and unhallowed work of crushing out the liberties of the South and extinguishing her yet vital sparks. The yoke that oppresses our necks will extend its mortal fetters around your proud steps and bring down both to a common grave if not a common infamy.

I shall not follow some examples that have been set me in this debate. I cannot consent to place the defense of the South upon the defects or misfortunes of other sections of the country. I must put her defense and her honor upon higher ground. Whenever I feel that I am obliged to defend the South by criminating and recriminating the North, I shall retire from this Chamber, and ask the proud State that I represent to send another here to do that work.

Nor shall I deem it any part of my duty here, of my duty anywhere, to ransack the sources of unjust misrepresentation to give them the appearance of respectability by their development on the floor of the Senate; nor shall I at any time feel at liberty to go into the proud States of this Union to see if, with envious or malignant eye, I cannot find something that shall blacken their bright names or mortify their just pride. Nor, sir, should I feel altogether justified in constructing an argument to be listened to by the American Senate and read by the American people composed of extracts taken here and there from the heated furnace of journalism. Nor should I consider that I served my country when I undertook to enlighten her counsels or direct her legislation by the uncertain and unsteady light that I had collected up from the passionate expressions, the intemperate sentences, the inconsiderate words of a few rash men scattered over the extent of half a continent; and least of all should I think or feel that I did justice to my country's history or reflected honor on her character or credit on my own name by going back over the records of her people or of her States, in whatever section they may be, to drag from their resting-places the errors or the follies of the past. No, sir; I shall not descend into the grave to see if I cannot bring to light from the tomb of the dead past something that may gratify malignant and insatiate passions. I shall shun that cowardly instinct of the hateful beast that finds its subsistence in the buried remains of nobler creatures and delights to feed on the dead forms it feared and shrank from while living. If my purpose was to destroy the fame of the American Republic; if I desired to diminish and circumscribe her beneficent influences all over the world; if I hoped to plant perpetual discord between her great sections; if my aim was to engage her statesmen and patriots in endless and bitter strife, such is the course I should adopt. I desire no such work. It is not consistent with any principle of my life to devote the time and ability of a Senator to the unprofitable and uncommendable task of discovering and exposing the faults and the vices of any sister State of this Union. I shall be content to believe that in the intense light of our civilization the people of each State can take best care of its own domestic affairs in the way that to them seems right and proper. I shall not, sir, come down to the language of aspersion against the character of any State or the character of her people. I have no ambition to prove that any one of the States has less title than another to the respect and admiration of the American people. I desire to see all of them great, good, and happy. If I behold any of her sister States advancing with grander strides and exhibiting more enterprise, virtue, or patriotism than North Carolina, I shall hold up that State as an example to our own people, and commend for their imitation her virtues and her glory. I shall not endeavor to detract one laurel from her brow or cast a shadow on the excellence of her character. I shall claim a part of her glory as my own, as a common renown in which every American has a share. If I shall unhappily see any State depressed, downcast, and wandering away from the orbit of her usefulness and dignity, far, far be it from me or mine to strike, to wound, to humiliate her; but her adversities shall excite my kindest consideration, and I will endeavor to support and strengthen her, and employ all constitutional means to restore her to health, prosperity, and honor.

What, sir, is the meaning of "sister States?" Is it an empty sound? Is it an epithet of irony? The Greeks, by a strange figure of speech, called the "Furies" Eumenides—the "Gracious." Are we to copy the fiction of their language into reality, and convert the "sister States" into the "States of Discord." In the name of a common country and by the sanctities of a common suffering, I protest against this family war. Cannot the States be indeed sisters in the full sense of that sacred word; sisters in interest, sympathy, affection, and duty, giving one to all and all to one support, assistance, and mutual confidence? In an unhappy hour they were torn apart and divided, and now after years of war and sorrow shall they not be again united in peace forever? Heaven forbid that discord should relight her consuming fires in their bosoms.

The honorable Senator from New York, who has discussed the pending question with his usual ability—and he always contributes to any subject the light of uncommon learning and the interest of a master's style—has discovered the secrets of all the troubles in the Southern States, has found the key that unlocks the hidden mysteries to whatever of lawlessness prevails in that unhappy section. Most earnestly the Senator informs us that opposition to negro suffrage, to colored citizenship, to manhood rights under the Constitution is the one cause for whatever is to be found in the South of aberration from the path of peace and law. Mr. President, has not the Senator confounded cause with effect? If the Senator's vision, usually so acute, had looked quite through the question, must he not have seen that negro suffrage, negro citizenship, and not opposition to these principles, was the cause of the anomalies at the South? Does the honorable Senator see no cause for unusual disturbance in the political elements from the fact that four millions of ignorant, uneducated, untrained people, totally unaccustomed to any self-government and utterly incapable of comprehending the principles or appreciating the duties that attach to this great function, have been suddenly invested with more than the balance of power in the Southern States? Does the Senator find in this ascendant fact no cause, no sufficient cause, for convulsion and upheaval in the political systems of the South? Does the intelligent Senator suppose that this unparalleled transformation could take place without producing shocks to the harmony of our polity? Is human government in the opinion of the Senator so unlike everything in the material universe that this vast and unwieldy mass of blind power could be instantly thrown on its wheels and not reverse or destroy their revolutions? If the Indian Ocean should be suddenly emptied into the Atlantic, boundless as are its capacities, the immense accession could not be withstood, and a tidal wave would in all probability submerge a continent. Elastic and vital as is the circumambient air, the sudden passage of a colder or a more heated current produces tornadoes and simooms that sweep over a hemisphere.

Is human government here in the American Republic superior to all laws of cause and effect, and are its genius and energy equal to any strain that may be placed upon it? The accession of a new planet in the measureless heavens would make the very suns tremble and stagger in their spheres; and yet the honorable Senator, with his acute and sensitive observation, can discover in the disorder of the southern planets no influence of that foreign body which counterbalances their established order and disarranges all the laws of their being. He would not be reckoned a faithful astronomer who, watching the heavens, should behold the beautiful constellation of the Southern Cross eclipsed by some "burning comet" of "pestilence and war," and then should hold up his hands in holy horror and exclaim against the malignant influence of the stars. Sir, the Senator advances yet a step further in this line of his argument, and declares that so desperate and extreme was the hostility to the constitutional rights of the colored man, his enemies resolved that the reconstruction acts and the constitutional amendments embodying their rights should be a failure, even at the point of producing a revolution at the South and overwhelming law, order, peace, liberty, and everything valuable in its ruins. It may be true, Mr. President, that the wrongs inflicted on the South were cruel enough to suggest to the Senator's mind the image of the blind giant, seizing the pillars of the temple and burying the oppressor and the oppressed in a common calamity. But let me assure the Senator that the people of the South have too clear a conception of their duty, too deep a sense of their obligation to the age and the country, and a too abiding hope in the ultimate triumph of justice, to have blindly despaired of the return of reason and madly rushed to their own destruction and infamy, in order to defeat a policy which, if successful, whatever motives prompted its adoption or whatever their opinions of its justice or wisdom, would result in their political ascendency and the physical regeneration of their country.

Let me assure the Senator that he has yet much to learn of southern character if he for one moment imagines that under the impression of passion or delusion they would imperil their lives and honor and the happiness and safety of their wives and children to revenge a fancied wrong, to mitigate a temporary evil, or to gratify a prejudice and resentment. In all candor let me ask the distinguished Senator if he really believes that the people of the South were so opposed, so hostile, so antagonistic to negro suffrage and citizenship as to commit suicide to defeat its success, as to annihilate everything of worth to accomplish its failure. I say I ask the Senator, if he so believes, does he think it quite right, quite just, quite patriotic, to have imposed on a brave and generous people a burden that they would surrender their lives and all that is dearer than life sooner than bear? Does the Senator think that such a sacrifice of the white people of the South would have been right? I cannot believe he does.

Let me inform the Senator that the proposition to bestow suffrage and citizenship upon four millions of human beings just emerging from slavery, and known to possess not the first qualification or requisite for the proper discharge of that highest power, did shock the moral sense and the patriotic emotion of the southern people to their deepest foundations. They could not realize the fact that the intelligent, virtuous, and patriotic people of the North could intrust the sacred responsibilities of the ballot and the higher duties of popular rulers to a class of persons, who no one was found insane enough to believe were in any sense fitted for the exercise of these inestimable rights and privileges.

The southern people were appalled at the danger which, like some mighty avalanche, was thus in a moment suspended over their rights, their social happiness, and their liberties. They with all sincerity regarded it as the most perilous experiment ever attempted at any time by a civilized people not entirely dissolved from all moral allegiance to the opinion of mankind. But, sir, they never proposed, they never conceived the supreme madness of attempting to avert these threatened and probable evils by the certain and purposed destruction by their own hands of all the muniments of law, society, civilization, and freedom. No; the South never looked to anarchy or chaos as their desperate deliverance from negro supremacy. They feared too deeply that these terrible curses would be the result of that reckless experiment. They never dreamed of precipitating that awful crisis. On the contrary they determined with the most patriotic fidelity to stand by the covenants of a constitution which had been imposed by power upon them, and to give the new departures from the great original the fairest trial and the most favorable test which the life of the country could bear. They saw the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments intrenched, imbedded, incorporated in the body and very life of the Constitution. They saw no possibility of any reversal of the popular judgment thus embodied in the organic law of the Republic. And in perfect good faith the people of the South resolved to make the best of their situation and to do everything in their power to carry into proper effect and enforcement the laws of the country. They determined to respect the rights of the black man, to cultivate his friendship, to conciliate his confidence, to promote his welfare, to elevate him by education, by counsel, by example, and by countenance and support up to the high duties of an American citizen. This was the general sentiment, wish, and purpose of the southern people after the reconstruction of the States. The history of that period attests its truth; it is illustrated in the acts of State Legislatures, the resolves of popular assemblies, and the common expression of the people and the press.

I regret to say what was the fate of this sincere and honest effort on the part of southern whites to live in political peace and prosperity with the colored race. Our offerings were spurned, our tenders mocked, our generosity ridiculed, and every effort we made, every word we spoke only united, intensified, exasperated the great body of colored voters yet more against us. This was not the fault of the negro, and the southern people have been too generous to charge him with it. The sin of its failure lies at the feet of those who for mercenary ends arrayed him, to the common injury of both, against the white man. We still labor, we still hope, we still faithfully strive to conquer his prejudices and convince him that we do not intend to destroy his rights or impair his happiness. But, while this has been our course—sincere, faithful, and determined—pursued with fidelity but not with confidence, let me say to the honorable Senator from New York that hatred of suffrage and equal rights of black men has not ruled the hour. We have no "unquenched resentment and prejudice," but we all have in our hearts kindly, anxious solicitude, deep concern, and a Christian humanity for the black man.

Sir, we have no prejudice of race, but we have a sentiment born with us, coeval with human creation, running through every age and felt in every clime—a sentiment as ineradicable as life, as inexorable as fact, as permanent as nature, as strong as the attraction of gravity, as invincible and irrepressible as the flow of the tides or the revolution of the seasons—that the white race is the leading, progressive, dominant race upon the earth. This is not prejudice of race. It is pride of race, character of race, dignity of race. It is not an unjust and arbitrary habit of the mind or the heart; it is an honorable conviction, founded in the experience of mankind from the beginning, and always maintained in every stage of human history. Not to admit it is to convict this nation of the grossest wrong and cruelty ever exercised in its treatment of the Indian tribes. Any other theory would make our forefathers ruthless robbers and their descendants the bloody successors to their crimes. Sir, I deny that this is so.

I say no man can read the world's history—no man can take up the map of the habitable globe to-day and fail to see the proof of this assertion. Look at the atlas of all the States and peoples upon the earth; run your eye back along down the long vistas of all the generations that have gone before us; consider the Assyrian, the Babylonian, the Greek, the Roman, the English, the French, the German, and all the people who are known in history; consider well all the nations of the earth and all the races of men, and tell me if you find civilization, art, science, enlightened government, happy society, law, order, progress, or true humanity among any but the white race. The Persians were white, the Greeks were white, the Romans were white, their conquerors were white, the Britons, the Saxons, the Normans, the Swiss, the Germans, the Russians, the Franks, the Northmen of Europe, were all white. Demosthenes, Cicero, Alexander, Cæsar, Columbus, Bacon, Shakespeare, Napoleon, Washington, Fulton, and Morse; the great scholars, the great captains, the great poets, the great orators, the painters, the sculptors, the inventors to whom we are indebted for steam and the telegraph; the great patriots, the great philosophers, the great characters of the Bible, the children of Israel, and also the conquerors of the earth, the philosophers, the benefactors, the masters of law, the masters of medicine, the constructors of human languages, the framers of good government, in every age and period of human life have belonged to the white race.

With these lights before us was it the "prejudice of race," the hatred, the unquenched resentment against the negro that inspired us? No, sir; but we could not eradicate our convictions, we could not falsify history, we could not surrender all that was high and noble and valuable to the mad idea of negro supremacy in the South. The descendants of Locke, Milton, and Hampden; the countrymen of Washington, Webster, and Story; the proud sons of fathers and mothers who had cherished and preserved liberty and law and honor with their lives and with every sacrifice for hundreds of years could not surrender all the heritages and the memories and the lessons of their own race, and look to the dark land of the sun for their rulers and exemplars. They saw Europe, the country of white men, radiant with civilization and learning and beauty. They saw America, his home in the New World, bright with liberty, progress, and Christian glory; and they could but see Africa in its dark and arid night, unbroken in successive barbarism and ignorance, and all the rays of civilization for five hundred years battling around its coasts and not able to penetrate its dense and deathly deserts a mile from the shore. Could we hesitate, ought we to have hesitated about our duty?

We resolved to be just, to be kind, to be humane to the black man, to respect his equal rights before the law, to give him every opportunity for improvement and advancement; but never, never to give up to him the proud inheritances of our race, the love of civil and religious liberty, the administration of justice, the lights of knowledge, the virtues of our fathers, and all the inestimable blessings of a Christian civilization. Far from incurring your censure for this, we are entitled to your commendation. In your mistaken policy of reconstruction you struck down the white race and you exalted the black. In your amendments to the Constitution there are no discriminations against the black man, but there were and are cruel exclusions, impediments, disabilities on the white man. You disqualified from holding office, and voting too, during the progress of reconstruction every man in the South who having ever held any public office of trust and honor had aided the rebellion. This disabling clause included all the experienced, trusted, able men of the South who had administered her governments. It left the government of that country in the hands of the inexperienced, embarrassed as they must be with the difficult element of negro suffrage, misled by designing and corrupt men. See what immense power you placed in the hands of four millions of blacks in the Southern States. Is there any precedent or parallel to it in the annals of human government? It is the first, the only time in the history of the human family that slaves have been made the political rulers of their former masters. Senators, when you put the chains and fetters of your disabling clause upon the white men of the South and excluded them from participation in the Government and invested the black man with all the rights and powers and privileges of the citizen unimpaired, did you not commit an act of cruel proscription against the white people of the South? You bound the southern people in inexorable contact and collision with blind, untrained negro suffrage. You lashed Mazeppa hand and foot to the wild steed of the desert, and left rider and horse to the vultures who pursued their ruin.

It is true we had fought you boldly and bravely; but the war was over; we had made peace; we wished to be brothers again. And now I ask if there was any just reason that the negroes of the South, whom your fathers no less than mine had made slaves, who had contributed nothing to the discovery and conquest of this continent, who had given no aid in the establishment of our liberties, who had exhibited no capacity for civil government or for social order, and who had none of the qualifications of education or experience for self-administration—I ask you if there was any just reason that these people should be given political supremacy, political advantage, political rank over a proscribed people who for eighty years had been your brothers, whose fathers had fought with yours at Bunker Hill, Yorktown, and New Orleans, and who could array against four years of civil war, against four years of alienation, four generations of patriotic, unselfish, illustrious devotion to the nation, its liberties and its glory?

Yet, Senators, here to-day, in the face of all that may be said about these four years of hostile and confronting war by men threatening disunion, men trying to tear down the Government, by men shedding oceans of blood, I present to you eighty years of our devotion to the country. I show you these houses builded by our fathers. I walk this Capitol, and as I enter the Rotunda I see four pictures illustrating southern history. As I go out upon the eastern square of the Capitol I see the statue to the Father of his Country, with that immortal inscription—

Istud simulacrum
Ad magnum exemplum libertatis
Nec sine ipsa duraturum.

As I go to my home and pass down the Potomac the toll of the bell tells me that there sleeps Washington, a southern man. As I go by way of Baltimore and down to Fortress Monroe, I see the Ripraps, the work of Calhoun. Though his name has been stricken from the fort he projected, I tell you, you can never tear it from the pages of American history. As long as those stones he planted there beat back the waves to the sea, the morning gun and the twilight cannon will echo that name; and there is not a gallant tar on the proud decks of your Navy who, as long as he respects and loves free trade and sailors' rights, will not remember the name and honor the patriot who defended them in this Chamber and the other end of the Capitol.

I repeat again, I would impair no right of the colored man. I would protect him faithfully in every right secured to him by the Constitution, and especially by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. I would protect him in his liberty, his citizenship, his right to vote. I would go further, and educate him and elevate him to the high position of all the duties and capacities of an American citizen. I would take him by the hand and lift him up and sustain him. I would never oppress or depress him because he is poor, ignorant, and a colored man. I would give him every opportunity of improving his physical, mental, and moral condition; and I would oppose and denounce any man or any party who would undertake to proscribe him and deny him these rights and these privileges. The laws, the Constitution of my country, guarantee to the negro these rights, and I will never violate them. But while I would endeavor most faithfully to do full and complete justice to the colored man, let me once for all say that I never could consent that the white people of the South, the white people of the country, should subordinate their rights, their attainments, their capacities, their prestiges to the colored man. On this subject my convictions are firmly fixed—immutably fixed and settled.

The capacity of the colored man for self-government is not yet determined; his capacity to attain and to utilize high intellectual culture has not been proved; his moral nature has not yet been fully developed; his disposition and his ability to maintain enlightened Christian civilization are yet in doubt, and to commit to him the destinies of the South, its fate, its future, with all its hopes and possibilities, would be an act of madness far beyond any language of mine to describe. It is a great mistake to think that the people of the South are unjust, unkind, or inimical in any sense to the colored race. We have felt too deeply the weights and burdens of oppression to desire to impose them on others. Our own experience has taught us profound, sincere sympathy for an oppressed people. We know what political vassalage is, and nothing could provoke us to inflict it on a weak and defenseless race. The yoke has been too bitter and galling on our necks for us to be willing to place it on the necks of others. We certainly now know the value of freedom, the blessing of free government, the happiness of equal laws, and we would be the last people on earth to deprive any human beings of these inestimable rights. Nor, sir, if we desired it, could we afford to be unjust or ungenerous to the colored people at the South. The greatest misfortune under which the South suffers is the ignorance of the northern people in reference to our real condition. You know but little of our wants and necessities. You do not understand our true situation. You are not the jurors of the vicinage. You are strangers, undertaking to compose and settle a question the first and simplest elements of which you do not understand. If you fully comprehended the state of things at the South you would know that there is a mutual dependence now and likely to be for a long time between the races. The blacks are poor and generally own no land. The whites possess all the land, and without labor they find their land valueless; hence the necessity of mutual concession, forbearance, and kindness; and I measure deliberately my words when I declare that to no laboring class has capital—land—ever made such concessions as have been made to the colored people at the South. The land-owner is compelled by every motive of interest and duty to treat the colored laborer with extreme kindness and fairness.

The competition among the land-owners for tenants and laborers to cultivate their lands is excited and constant; and the great object of the planters is not, as has been most untruly alleged, to drive the negroes from their homes, but it has been and will be to get negroes to settle on and work their lands. I am perfectly well satisfied that any systematic attempt to intimidate the blacks by threats to drive them from the plantations for opinion's sake would result in utter and ridiculous failure. They would not leave one plantation before they would be gladly invited and welcomed to another. Every effort in the South in the direction of any combination to control or regulate our labor system has signally failed. The interests of the land-owners themselves always defeat any such enterprise. And such will always be the case—the necessary state of things in any country in which labor is scarce and land is plentiful.

There is another fact in the history of the negro at the South that constitutes a great safeguard to his interests and some protection to his rights. It is well known that the colored man will not remain where he is not well treated. The planter who practices injustice or cruelty or oppression on the colored man soon finds his plantation depopulated and his fields a desert, and I promise my friend from New York that "resentments and prejudices" do not long survive defeats of this character. And then, sir, over and above all of these considerations, far above all of them, is the sense of justice of the honorable men of the South. That sense of justice would scorn to wrong the colored man. Enlightened public opinion at the South demands and exacts fair dealing with the blacks. No white man at the South can maintain a respectable position in society who is habitually cruel or unjust to the colored people; and the calumny that they do not receive justice in our courts is gross and flagrant. In the name of that learned and honorable profession to which it is my pride to belong, and which in all ages of the world has proved the fearless advocate of the oppressed and the manly defender of right, whose history is the record of justice and liberty, I protest against this cruel libel on the lawyers, the judges, the courts of the South. I appeal to that common law of honor known among the profession, wherever the English language is spoken, to disbelieve and refute the calumny.

Think you, Senators, that the bar that took its stamp from Marshall, Iredell, Gaston, Badger, and Pinckney would descend from its high estate to become the persecutors of poor helpless blacks?

Mr. President, there is a matter sometimes intimated, sometimes charged, sometimes advanced in one direction and sometimes demonstrated in another, that I feel it part of my duty to answer. I think it is my duty to do it, and I hope it will not be thought to be inappropriate here. We have been told that there will be in the next Congress eighty-eight confederate soldiers. I ask the Clerk to read the first paragraph from an address delivered by General Burnside a day or two ago.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Some of our people are naturally enough alarmed at the election to Congress by the southern people of a large number of the ex-officers of that army. Now, comrades, it seems to me that a little consideration will show that there is no great cause for alarm. These ex-officers, it should be remembered, are under paroles of honor. While we all believe that the most sacred earthly duty of an American citizen is that of loyalty to the Republic, yet we must not lose sight of the fact that a soldier, in his individual capacity of a soldier, can realize no contingency that would make him violate his parole.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I desire to send from this Chamber my thanks to General Burnside, the Senator-elect from Rhode Island, for that manly sentiment in behalf of the men whom he so lately met bravely in battle. I tell you that there is with us, if it can be, a higher sentiment of honor and duty even than the parole of which he speaks. And here, let me say that since the surrender at Appomattox we have been accustomed at the South, the soldiers and the people, to look upon the soldiers of the North as our best friends. It is true that for four years we met them in battle after battle, and that blows were given and blows received such as the god of war has seldom witnessed. But when the strife was ended we felt that the soldiers of both armies were and would be forever friends. Next in our hearts to our own loved comrades were the gallant adversaries with whom we had striven in honorable conflict; the ashes of our noble dead mingled in the same field with the honored dust of the brave men of the North, and their common memories were the sacred trust of our affection and sorrow. Between the survivors there existed that brave sympathy which in all ages has done so much honor to a soldier's character. On both sides they knew the convictions which inspire men when they take their lives in their hands and offer them to the service of their country. They knew that nothing but the highest and purest sense of duty can animate and sustain a soldier through a long and bloody war. They knew a soldier's devotion to honor. They remembered the lines of a hundred battles upon which the brave men of the North met the brave men of the South, and along which no soldier ever refused to a wounded adversary the last drop of water in his canteen or to divide the last cracker in his haversack. They remembered their common dangers, privations, and patriotism. They felt a mutual admiration for their virtues, and they had the common memory of gallant and devoted achievement. There was between them that high respect which courage always inspires, and both had won too much glory for either to envy the trophies of the other. I need not say that in their brave hearts there was no place for hatred or revenge. When the arms were grounded and the flags furled and laid away all antagonism ceased, and one generous desire for peace and fraternal union pervaded all ranks of the dissolving armies. Hands that had lately met in deadly conflict were now grasped with friendly fervor, and tears of regret and of joy flowed freely down cheeks scarred with the furrows of war. Can it ever be forgotten that in that unhappy struggle brothers were arrayed on opposing sides, and that when the contest was over they met as brothers again. May I not say that it was a conflict between brothers, sons of the same glorious mother, and when it was over they were brothers once more.

Since the surrender at Appomattox I have met hundreds, yes thousands of your gallant men, the men who fought for the Union, and I have yet to meet the first soldier who did not grasp my extended and open hand with the cordial clasp of friendship and patriotism. I cannot, I will not permit these feelings, these sentiments, honorable alike to the gallant men of both causes, to be disturbed by any words that may be spoken here. No party excitement, no intense zeal, no heated denunciation, no intemperate expressions, no sectional animosities shall obscure or obliterate the just, hopeful, patriotic impressions which these noble facts have left on my mind. I prefer to cherish and preserve them in undimmed and glowing brightness—

> Within the book and volume of my brain,
> Unmix'd with baser matter.

Instead of sectional passions, divisions, strifes, let the blood, the tears, the affections of American soldiers, be they from the North or from the South, form a bow of peace that shall stand forever as the bond and arch of a united people. Upon it there will be drops of sorrow, but it will be radiant with honor and patriotic duty and hope.

We have been told by the press and we have heard here that in the next Congress there will be more than eighty confederate soldiers. Let that fact, Mr. President, give the country no alarm, no excitement. You will find these representatives conservative, patriotic, and national, eminently desirous of being just and generous to the whole country, and resolved to demonstrate their fidelity to the Government and to prove to the world that they are as true and honorable defenders of the Union and the Constitution as they were gallant and devoted soldiers of the confederacy. If the soil or the honor of the nation were to be assailed by a foreign or domestic foe you would see them with their noble comrades rushing to its defense, illustrating the same courage and constancy which they displayed for their own altars and furnishing the world an example of the invincible prowess of American arms when united. I pray the calamity of war may not befall this country; I pray God to avert it from us; but if unhappily it should come, the American people will witness the unsurpassed valor and patriotism of southern soldiers, and will embrace with gratitude and affection their countrymen whom they now distrust and denounce. Deploring war as among the greatest if not the greatest scourge, if my country should summon her sons to her defense I would go as far to protect her rights and her honor, and I would advance with the same sense of duty and the same devotion, that I hope animated me in the struggle of the South.

How, Mr. President, as a man sworn to support the Constitution and the Union, could I have in my heart one spot hostile or indifferent to either? Surrounded by the afflictions and deep harassments of my section, and deprecating war from the bottom of my heart, I have at times almost wished for it with some foreign foe, that in the united sacrifices of the South and the North all the bitter memories of the civil conflict and all the animosities of section might be buried and forgotten.

Mr. President, there is another subject upon which the South is gravely misunderstood. We are represented as hostile, cherishing bitter, deadly, low hate to northern people. I do not know how to discuss it. We desire northern people to come among us. We wish them to come. If there is anything in the world now that is more desirable at the South except peace than good northern settlers, I do not know what it is. I know of nothing that we so welcome, nothing that is so cheerfully embraced. Sir, I will say that the present unhappy condition of the South might have been very different if good northern people had come in place of many who came only to curse us.

The condition of the South might have been far different. I can imagine a large number of intelligent, virtuous, patriotic citizens from the North, animated by love of enterprise and attracted by our beautiful climate and soil, coming to the South to make their homes with us. I can see them bringing with them the thrifty industries of northern habits. I can see in them a firm adherence to their own opinions, tempered with a just tolerance for our convictions. I can see them bringing their pure and happy families, the beloved pledges of their attachment, to their new homes. I can see them benevolently striving to mitigate the calamities that surround their southern neighbors. I can see them laboring to restore and establish friendship and kindness between the white and black races. I can see them persuading our people to adopt their improved system of common schools, and teaching us by the example of their success to divide our large estates into small and flourishing farms. I can see them leading us to utilize all the grand resources of our forests, our mines, our rivers, our water-powers, and all the unequaled production sand fruits of our generous soil. I can see them building beautiful villages, erecting comfortable homes, raising stately churches, and opening up new avenues of commerce all over the South. And I can see the ardent, frank, brave, generous southerner taking these honorable, useful comers by the hand, welcoming them to the land of his birth, and to the hospitalities of his heart. I can see springing up by their common efforts a cordial, sympathetic, indissoluble union of interest and sentiment, and the growth of a progressive, happy, honorable community. I can see there a true and perfect forgetfulness and oblivion of all the bitter memories of past conflicts, and a united love and affection for a Government founded by their fathers and illustrated by a common glory. On such a scene my eyes would delight to rest, my heart rejoice to repose. Descendants of those who landed at Plymouth and Manhattan, and of those who settled on the James and the Cape Fear, again meeting, after years of terrible conflict, to enjoy peace, and to live under a free Government of equal laws.

But, unfortunately, the South presents a very different scene. The class of northern citizens whom I have described did not come in large numbers to the South. Among those who came after the war were many honorable and worthy men, who have remained with us and to-day, without exception, enjoy the confidence and respect of the southern people.

In my own State there are many such men, for whom I have great respect and kindness, and who I believe entertain confidence and attachment to me. There is at Elizabeth City, North Carolina, a colony of northern men of two hundred prosperous, contented, patriotic people, very generally belonging to the republican party.

I do not desire to put party in this speech. If I could write it and leave the word out, I would do so. There is something to me in the condition of our country far above party. The honor of my country, the perpetuity of this Union, the preservation of its liberties, are far, transcendently above party. No party ties, associations, or fetters could bind me for a moment where my duty to the South was concerned. A northern colony is on the Roanoke, near Jamesville; another is at Ridgeway's, in Warren County; another at Henderson, in Granville County; another at Raleigh, the capital of the State; another at Beaufort, another in Guilford County, another on the Cape Fear, and they are all doing well and are greatly respected.

Sir, we have been asked in this debate to name the northern man who had been honored by the South with high position, and the question was put with an air of triumph, indicating that it could not be answered. Sir, let me tell Senators what I supposed was obliged to be known to all the world, that the noble Commonwealth of Virginia, the "Mother of States," elected to her executive office—the highest position in her gift—Hon. Gilbert C. Walker, a northern man by birth and education, a Union man during all the war, and not a resident of the State of Virginia until its conclusion. Governor Walker is my answer, my example, and my illustration. Of him it is feeble praise to say that he is a gentleman without reproach, a patriot without fear, a statesman without sectional prejudice, and an American citizen with a warm, honest heart. These qualities gave him the confidence of that illustrious people. He deserved it; and now he is to represent the capital district of that grand State in the next Congress of the United States, and there is no more honored or loved name among that intelligent and patriotic people. Virginia makes the son of New York, the citizen of Illinois, who fought against her on her own sacred soil, her governor and her Representative in Congress. There is the reply to the unjust charge that the South is unfair in any sense to men of worth, come from what State they may.

But unfortunately many who came to the South were not like Governor Walker. Another and a widely different class flocked to our borders as the great armies dissolved and the work of restoration began. They were not of the Adamses, the Hancocks, the Websters of Massachusetts. They were not of the Hamiltons, the Clintons, the Wrights of New York. They were not of the patriot statesmen of Pennsylvania. They were not of the steadfast, vigorous character of Ohio. They were not of the bold, honest freemen of the West. They were not of the intrepid, generous pioneers of the Pacific slope. Without character or position in the States that gave them birth, with no ties of property or association there, without respect for themselves and with no regard for the rights or feelings of others, they saw in the prostrate South a field for enterprise congenial to their natures and pursuits. They came as the vultures come. They entered the despoiled and wasted garden of the South only to plant in it a curse darker and deadlier than the ruins of war. There they planted no cheerful fruits, there they cultivated no gentle flowers, but there they sowed with a profuse hand the thorns and thistles of hate and bitter passion. They spared no sacred relic of time, they respected no cherished custom of our fathers. To the demon passion of a groveling avarice they sacrificed every sentiment of justice and humanity, and to that base idolatry they were alone faithful. Finding the unhappy colored man just emerging from slavery, they used him as the ladder to political preferment, and prostituted the position so acquired to the vilest venality and peculation. Whatever was necessary to the accomplishment of their rapacious purposes was accomplished boldly and without remorse. Restrained by no conscience, recognizing the white people of the South as the victims of conquest, and the colored race as the convenient instruments of their oppression, they sacrificed both to their personal aggrandizement. To unite the negro race against the white people, and thus secure the possession of power, they deliberately alienated the blacks from the whites, and wrought them into a compact, unbroken, and inflamed mass, desperately opposed to anything the whites could propose for their common benefit. They exasperated this antagonism of race to the highest and last pitch of intensity. They arrayed the blacks against the whites in almost deadly division.

Not content with this fearful exploit, they maliciously set to work to excite the poor and uneducated against those who had education, property, or position. They aroused every prejudice of class and appealed to every passion of discontent. From the most degraded walks of life they selected the accomplices of their schemes of public wrong and exalted them to high and respectable offices and places. Aided by the United States Army and constantly supported and encouraged by congressional legislation, they united with southern men, some of whom were corrupt and others misguided, and obtained official power, patronage, and place all over the Southern States. Military rule, commonly the terror of a civilized people, proved in this time a mercy and a protection to Virginia. She was spared the spoliation and humiliation that befell her once proud sisters. No sooner were they securely fixed in power than that unparalleled carnival of venality, peculation, waste, and spoil began that has shocked the moral sense of the civilized world and brought reproach upon the age in which we live and the country where it transpired.

In two years the debts of the Southern States were increased two hundred millions. Every available resource, revenue, and assets of these afflicted States were converted into money, and went the same dark road to enrich the office-holder and beggar the people. Funds sacredly dedicated to educate the children of the people did not escape the common fate of spoliation. Public justice was shamelessly bartered in the streets. Offices, laws, and honors were sold after the manner that the pretorian guard sold the crown of the Roman Empire to Julianus, the most corrupt and infamous of usurpers. The National Government even did not escape the general contamination. You beheld with patriotic shame the precious privileges of admission to the lofty schools for the soldiers and sailors of the Republic bartered and sold; a price in money fixed upon those exalted duties. How long will honor survive when the youth who is to guide the nation's armies and sail her proud navies knows that his commission was bought, and that the representatives of his people are purchasable with money? Young man, blush to wear the star of a soldier, that should be won with a soldier's duty, when bought with the base coin that stains your country's honor!

In the presence of this spoliation and dishonor of a people the cruelties of Verres in Sicily, the wrongs of Hastings in India, sink into trifling misdemeanors. In the grand eclipse of the last six years these historic enormities are but feeble spots on the dark picture. History has drawn in her darkest colors, poetry and eloquence have arrayed in their gloomiest outlines, painting has elaborated with her somber skill, the rapacity and ruthless extortions of Cortez and Pizarro; and though their perishing forms have moldered for more than a century, the moral sense of mankind has kept alive their memories for universal execration and their accursed example as a dreadful warning to the transcendent in wickedness. But what were their deeds compared with the spoliation, the corruption, the misrule that prevailed in the Southern States under the governments that sprang up after the reconstruction acts? Far be it from me, Mr. President, to include in this class whom I have thus feebly endeavored to describe the large majority of northern men who come South. Among them are many excellent and worthy persons, whose coming to the South promises much good to our section; men of character, of virtuous habits, of patriotic impulses, belonging to both parties—republican and democrat. We welcome these men among us without regard to their party sympathies; we acknowledge their usefulness. I only denounce those who, in unison with bad men of the South, have brought this ruin upon our States. In this denunciation I shall not be guilty of that injustice which has been perpetrated on the other side of this Chamber. Far be it from my purpose, because a few extremely wicked and corrupt men have despoiled my section, to cast a stigma upon a large and estimable class of useful and patriotic citizens. That would be as unjust, as cruel, and as untrue as the attempt to make the whole southern people or the people of any southern State responsible for the excesses, the outrages, the crimes, that have been committed by a few individuals, in a few isolated spots, in a few unhappy localities over the South.

But, sir, other imputations are brought here against the South, all calculated to create prejudice against her people. Frequent allusions have been made in this debate to what Senators are pleased to call "southern chivalry," in terms of derision and reproach. I shall not discuss with Senators the propriety of their criticisms. That is a question of taste, about which we may well differ. I trust sincerely that the day is not far distant when a just corrective of a custom I do not defend, and which has been greatly abused, shall be found in an enlightened Christian public sentiment. To that humane arbitrament I hope always to be able to defer. But, sir, to whatever tribunal I shall feel called upon to refer that responsibility, which seems in some quarters to give so much offense, I trust I shall be scrupulously careful to observe, in all controversies, every law of courtesy and kindness, and never so far to forget what is due to myself and equally due to others as to substitute in intellectual combat for the parliamentary weapons of reason and argument the use of opprobrious epithets, harsh aspersions, violent crimination and recrimination. I shall leave such means of warfare to be employed by those to whose tastes and sentiments they are more compatible. While I should regard them as the feeblest instruments of assault upon the position of others, I should certainly feel that they were the weakest armor for my own character or honor. Holding myself strictly accountable for all that I may utter in this Chamber or elsewhere, I shall not dispute with any champion the laurels that are to be won on the field of personal or partisan abuse. Those who are ambitious of that palm may wear it.

But if by these references to "southern chivalry" Senators intend to impute to the people of the South any want of those high qualities of honor, virtue, truth, courage, and dignity of character which have been asserted to belong to them, or the absence of those gentler humanities of charity, courtesy, generosity, and all the graces of Christian life, I meet the Senators on the threshold of their accusation, and I tell them before the world that this impeachment of the character of our people is groundless and injurious; as unjust to those who make it as it is to the brave, honest, noble people who are thus misunderstood, misrepresented, and defamed. I repel the aspersion with the indignant scorn of an injured and outraged people. I repel it in the name of eight millions of living, virtuous freemen; I repel it in the name of twelve generations of gallant patriots; I protest against it by the solemn judgment of history; I refute it by the character of the living and the dead; I appeal from it in its error and madness to the universal and concurrent testimony of mankind. I hurl it to the ground; I trample it in the dust. There is not an event in the nation's annals connected with the South that does not condemn and rebuke the odious sentiment. It can find no habitation or sympathy in the heart of the civilized world; it can find no lodgment in one solitary, isolated spot of authentic tradition; it will be banished and driven away from the face of men in despair of finding a home where truth and justice reside. Branded with infamy all over, it must seek a resting place only in bosoms from which the dark passions of hate and fury have forever excluded the light.

Before the Republic has attained little more than a man's life have we reached a development of passion that France did not mature for nearly a thousand years? Are we in the early youth of the nation about to discover the worst symptom of the insane maladies that assailed France in the revolution? Have we so soon fallen on the dark scene in the drama of nations which marked the declining days of the Roman Empire? Is all truth confounded before our eyes, and are the very vestiges of justice obliterated from our hearts? What unheard-of madness has destroyed the consciousness of fact in our minds and the sensibility of conscience within us? Has the storm of sectional strife drowned the voice of history? Are the living records of the age erased by the intensity of party heat? Has memory been dethroned from the human mind and her proud scepter surrendered to prejudice? For such must be our melancholy condition when we can believe that the "South is degenerate." Rise from your graves, immortal founders of the Republic, and rebuke the impious calumny! Great Father of your Country, I invoke your hallowed name to silence it forever. Illustrious author of the "Declaration," has thy glory been so soon extinguished? Father of the Constitution, has thy honored name perished amid the blows inflicted on thy great work? Hero of New Orleans, has the bright fame of your victory over a foreign foe been eclipsed by a more recent victory over the liberties of the State you defended? Has the 8th of January, 1815, been blotted out by the 4th of January, 1875?

When did the South become degenerate? When her sons unaided and alone bore the "Lone star" westward and carved an empire State from the heritage of the Montezumas? Or did her courage expire on the blazing heights of Buena Vista, and did Taylor and Bragg and Crittenden dim its luster? Was her honor lost by Scott or Lee in the valleys, on the hills, or before the walls of Mexico, or was her bright sword tarnished when Butler and the Palmetto Regiment left on the field of Churubusco the example that was to be no more gloriously followed by the six hundred at Balaklava? Are we to be told of southern degeneracy in the Halls of this Capitol, where the echoes of the mighty words of Clay and Calhoun still ring in our ears and the proud images of Marshall and Taney stand guard at the altars of justice; where ten Presidents of the United States rise before our eyes to attest its falsehood, and a train of heroes, statesmen, jurists, with an endless line of patriots, proclaim its injustice? Senators, before you can believe it, you must tear from American history its brightest pages; you must pull down the Capitol, remove its monuments, and obliterate its name. Go to the uttermost limits of the earth, follow the remotest waves of the sea, stand on any spot in the vast breadth of your country, and look up and behold the flag of the Republic, and the starry banner that blazes over your head will recall at the "dawn's early light and the twilight's last gleaming" the genius and soul of the southern patriot from whom it derived its dearest inspiration. But Senators will exclaim this is the South as she was, not as she is; the South years ago when she stood with the North in the Union, not the South during and since the war, shorn of her strength and beauty.

I am admonished not to tread on ground on which the smothered fires are not yet extinguished; but though I walked barefooted and blindfolded over burning plowshares, in this I ought not to hesitate; for he who with a right heart bravely treads the path of truth and duty has nothing to fear. Yes, Senators, duty more sacred than life commands me to ask on what field in the late ever-to-be-deplored war did the South betray anything but the highest qualities of the best of men? Where were the evidences of her decline and degeneracy? Ask your noble patriots who met her no less noble sons on a hundred ensanguined fields? Read the reports of your generals and all contemporaneous history and you will look in vain for but one response. I will draw no contrasts between those brave armies, those true, devoted men on either side. I only wish their great struggle had been a united effort to expand the area of free institutions, to extend the light of American civilization, to enlarge and magnify all the beneficent influences of American liberty. While I shed tears over the loss of the gallant men of both armies I rejoice in their common bravery, truth, fortitude, and splendid achievements, and still more in the fact that no one but Americans could have resisted as we did and that none but Americans could have persevered as you did; yet I but speak the simple truth before the world and before Heaven when I declare that human history from the beginning has failed to furnish a brighter example of all the devoted qualities of soldiers' duty than was daily exhibited in the army of the South. I need not recall those who formed that glittering line of bayonets on Marye's burning hill; who met the red storm of blood and fire at Chancellorsville; who stepped like bridegrooms to a marriage feast up the stony ridge at Gettysburgh, and meeting death from foemen worthy of their steel, fell back like the sullen roar of broken waters. I need not recall those noble spirits who drew their expiring breath in the mortal trenches at Petersburgh or who bore their wasted forms and looked for the last time upon earth upon the bleak hills of Appomattox.

No, Senators, we are worthy to be your countrymen, worthy to be the patriot-brothers of your own ever-glorious and honored men who prevailed against us. Instead of carping and criminating and taunting, let us bury deep and forever every recollection of that war that does not revive the common honor and courage and Christian humanity of the North, and the South, and the whole American people. If there be any cloud upon the arms of either, thank God there is glory enough for the arms of both, and that glory belongs to the American people. Are not the victories of Pompey and Cæsar the common renown of Rome? Are not the "red rose" and the "white rose" now intertwined in the crown of England's history? Is it indelicate for me to remind you that the noble Greeks, the Athenians and the Spartans, erected monuments of perishable wood to celebrate victories over their countrymen? They built them for their triumphs over foreign foes of enduring marble and brass. The brave Romans, whose conquering legions made the world their empire, never permitted a triumph to any victor in their civil wars. Those nations of antiquity would not perpetuate their own strifes. Shall this Christian Union be less magnanimous than the republics of the idolatrous ages?

The Southern States tender you their faithful support of the Government; they offer you their treasure in peace, their valor in war, their resolution to pay their part of the national debt, incurred for their coercion; they desire to extend to you the trust and affection of warm and loyal hearts, and for all this they give you the pledge of an honor that was never broken. What more can you wish? Will you refuse these proffered duties; will you repel these priceless offerings; will you insult this generous spirit? Will you treat with incredulity and disdain these honorable conciliations? Will you return for them alienation, taunt, and mockery? Or will you receive them with just confidence, with reciprocal affection, with unreserved patriotism? What more do you desire? Do you hope to see us descend to self-abasement and self-degradation? Do you expect us to dishonor our history, to deny our convictions, to humble and debase our manhood, to forget our duty, and to cover our names with inexpia-ble shame, by false, cowardly, servile pretenses and professions that would shock every sentiment of truth in our bosoms? Let me tell you, Senators, this can never, never be. These proud States will not come on bended knees and bow their majestic forms on the steps of this Capitol, mortified, humiliated, prostrated in the dust. Better, a thousand times better, that the stars on the flag of the Republic which bear the names of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia be blotted out forever, like the lost Pleiad from the constellation, than become pale and feeble satellites to represent dishonored and degraded sisters!

What will be the sentiment of the great people of the North? What will be the opinion of the world, when it is known that northern Representatives in Congress rejected with scorn and contempt every effort of the South for peace and justice? In what characters will history record the fact, that after four years of bloodiest war and the expenditure of countless millions to preserve the Union, the North persistently declined with contumely and crimination every expression of friendship, every offer of peace, every tender of good-will, every aspiration for fraternal restoration that the people of the South could with justice, with propriety, and truth make? That will be a startling page in history which transmits to future ages that all our sentiments and hopes and wishes and exertions for conciliation were answered with doubt, distrust, reproof, and bitter calumniation. I cannot, I will not believe this condition is to continue. Between the North and the South there is now no just cause of quarrel, no ground for separation, no necessity for hostility. No great moral sentiment, no transcendent material interest now divides us. But every argument of reason, every motive of interest, every obligation of duty, every consideration of honor, every sentiment of patriotism—all demand and enforce peace and perpetual harmony between the sections.

But, Senators, peace at the price of our honor is impossible. That sacrifice will never be made. Abuse, denunciation, aspersion, are not the instruments of reconciliation. Silence under them, submission to them, concurrence in them would be the highest crime. The people who consent to their own dishonor deserve to be slaves. Heaven save us from this deepest wrong to ourselves.

If with all the lights before us, with the lessons of the great past, the instructions of our forefathers, in the noonday of the nineteenth century, in the blaze of its civilization, we could so far forget our duty, our love of country, our own self-respect, and our regard for the opinion of the world as to consent for the sake of a temporary repose to the violation of our consciences, to the concealment of our opinions, to the suppression of the truth, and descend to the base and abject confession that the calumnies on our people were true, we should deserve the supremest curse of mankind for having attained the most exquisite refinement in infamy and for having discovered new and profounder depths of hypocrisy and falsehood. By the eternal love of truth that binds man to his Maker we protest, and we will protest to the end, against the injustice that would destroy our character. We can bear our poverty; fortitude and patience will overcome our privations. Energy will restore our desolated fields, industry will repair our lost homes, economy will recover our wasted wealth, time will heal our great sorrows; but for lost and abandoned character there is no future, no regeneration. No people have ever survived the death of their character. Nothing can relume that luster when once extinguished. Let us thank God that the people of the South, in the wreck and darkness of their disasters, still cherish and defend with deep and fervent devotion their honor. It is the cloud of light by day and the pillar of fire by night that will preserve them in the wilderness of their troubles. No people who love truth, who respect virtue, who cultivate courage, who defend freedom, who reverence religion, can ever be enslaved or degraded.

Mr. President, if I desired to see the two great divisions of the Republic—the North and the South—forever alienated and antagonistic, if I desired to reopen and deepen and widen the bitter gulf between them, if I wished to plant the ineradicable seeds of hatred, revenge, and vindictive passions in the hearts of their people, I should pursue the course of the republican Senators on this floor, who have denounced without remorse the people of the South. I speak not of the injustice of the indiscriminate aspersion of eight millions of people; but I refer to the thoughtless impolicy of that aspersion. If Senators desire sincerely the harmony of the sections, is relentless vituperation the road that leads in that direction? Do they not consider that if there be, as they charge, those at the South who are not reconciled to the Union; if there be discontented, unhappy, misguided men among us who yet desire to continue the strife of the sections, do they not perceive that this unjust, sweeping imputation and impeachment of our whole people lays the foundation for hostile argument to the Union and the North? Sir, let me in all candor ask what reply is to be made to the restless and passionate demagogue at the South, ay, to the just and honest son of that devoted section, who shall demand of me, "With what propriety do you ask us to unite in heart with those who delight to abuse and to vilify us? We are doing all that honorable and good men can do for peace and union, and we are met with denunciation and calumny. It seems that nothing can satisfy the animosity of our enemies. Our ruin has only excited them to more cruel wrongs, and when they have exhausted all our resources, they propose to destroy our reputation." I confess that such statements are difficult to answer, and were all the northern people like those who so misunderstand and misrepresent us, I should have but little hope for the future of my country. But happily the great mass of the North, in my judgment, respect our motives and are beginning to earnestly desire our deliverance. Ten years of devoted suffering at the South, and the immense difficultics that surround our situation, are beginning to enlighten the northern mind to our true condition. Their sympathies are being excited, their sense of justice aroused, their sensibility to their own interests awakened, their love of good government and fear of its overthrow alarmed, and their confidence reversed in the wisdom and patriotism of those who now, at the expiration of a decade since the last gun was fired, resort to the "soldier and the sword" for the establishment of law and order.

But to those who in patriotic sincerity ask, "How I can daily hear the unjust abuse of our people and still labor and hope for reconciliation and justice without yielding to indignant resentment?" I will say that before the South lies a great duty, a duty far above the passions of the day; a duty whose influence is to descend to distant generations—the duty of preserving constitutional liberty and of vindicating and maintaining in undiminished glory the character of the southern people. The success of that duty must not be imperiled by resentment or excitement. In the presence of such interests the ordinary emotions of the human heart stand rebuked, and the highest and noblest sentiments of our souls and the most exalted powers of the mind are summoned to exertion. Before such a duty the sacrifice of passion is a glory, the conquest of our nature sublime honor. Nothing can secure its accomplishment but disciplined virtue and patriotism; the subordination of impulse to that chastened wisdom and devotion which, relying on justice, truth, and reason for defense, leave far beneath them the disordered tempers that are excited in the inferior conflicts of life. By the fate of our people, before the sacred magnitude of our duty, what are personal or party irritations? I disown and dismiss them as not approaching the dignity of our defense. My faith is in the justice of our cause and the ultimate triumph of truth and right. No, sir, I do not put the defense of the South upon the crimination of the North. I place it on higher ground. I found her vindication not on imputation, aspersion, denunciation of another section, but I plant it firmly on her own character and reputation, upon her integrity and truth, upon her honor and virtue, upon the history of her patriotic services and the candor, manliness, and good faith with which she has always acted.

Sir, I have received since this debate commenced paper after paper, extract upon extract, letter on letter, with statement and account in summary and in detail of violations of the law at the North and of unjust expressions to the South. I have no use for such material. I discard it altogether. This is not the place for it. Aggression on the North is no justification for wrong at the South, and the South holds such a policy of argument in scorn and contempt. Justice to her character demands that any imputation on her good name should be met and repelled, and she will meet and repel it with indignant truth. Sir, what is to be accomplished by this mutual and reciprocal denunciation of the sections? Will it elevate our character abroad? Will it dignify it at home? Will it confer a blessing upon any American citizen? I had much rather see mutual and reciprocal forbearance and commendation; mutual and reciprocal desire for the improvement of the sections; mutual and reciprocal purpose to render justice to all parts of the country, and a mutual and reciprocal union of interest, rights, duties, and sentiments for the common benefit and glory of all. No, sir; I shall send no firebrands to the South to incense and inflame her proud people. I shall send no poisoned arrows to the North to rankle in the bosom of her peace. I shall endeavor to hold up the light of truth to both sections, that each may see in the other much to commend and something to forgive and forget. And shall unjust assault be made upon any State of this Union, be it North or South, I shall spring to her defense with whatever of courage or ability I may have.

Mr. President, an immense drag-net has been cast over the entire South to discover some fact, some circumstance, some fragment of evidence that might give color to the charge that the southern people were unfriendly to the Government of the United States, utterly regardless of their duty as citizens, and generally violent and lawless. Telescopes of every magnitude have swept the whole southern horizon; microscopes of the largest magnifying power have been brought to bear upon the condition of the South and every atom subjected to their influence to find some speck of latent rebellion among the various and differing tempers of an impulsive people. The inquisition has been thorough and complete. Nothing has escaped the vigilance of our watchful guardians. Nothing has been too high for their reach, nothing too low for their supervision. Their analysis of all the alleged poisons in the prostrate system of the South has been acute, jealous, and comprehensive. Their opportunities for conducting this searching and expanded examination have fully equaled their anxieties. Agents, spies, detectives, informers—the mercenary and corrupt instruments of power—have gone all over the South to discover, invent, and expose the denounced crimes. Eleven thousand postmasters in the Southern States are the sentinels of the administration party. The revenue officers by hundreds watch with jealous care the party's interest. The judges, the attorneys, the marshals, the clerks, and all the officers and their assistants and subordinates in the United States courts are the vigilant guardians of the nation's laws and peace. Senators, Members of Congress, governors of States, members of State Legislatures, and almost every office-holder in the South, faithfully collect and develop every fact, incident, and circumstance that tends to prove this accusation of their party and upon which they seem to think its existence depends. Able committees have been appointed by Congress to investigate these conditions of the South. Military detachments, are stationed all over the suspected districts of the South. The press, too, with the hundred hands of Briareus and with the hundred eyes of Argus, observe and report every occurrence of general interest. Light blazes all over the scene. Nothing is left in obscurity or doubt. The eyes not only of the Administration but of the whole country are concentrated on the South. And now, with all of the evidence before us, let us determine the truth of this indictment of the Government against the country.

I do not propose, Mr. President, to rely upon the presumption of innocence until crime is proved; that just, humane, wise rule of our law, established and approved in all enlightened jurisprudence for ten centuries. I wish to meet the allegation upon the facts before the country. With the permission of the Senate let me direct your attention for a moment to the State of Kentucky. She stands first on the roll of the impeached and prosecuted States. And what, sir, I repeat, what is the evidence against that proud, patriotic, gallant State? Will Senators reflect? The conviction and condemnation of her great people is demanded upon the floor of the Senate upon one newspaper paragraph—a solitary half-column in the single issue of a daily paper—and that article an able and eloquent protest against the sentiment it condemns. Sir, is not the very rebuke of that popular journal proof that the enlightened public sentiment of the State is against the error it so boldly denounces? Was not that article written to correct and reform the very abuse; and does not that argument reflect and represent the best public opinion, the opinion of the intelligent and moral influence of the country? But Senators have deluded themselves and endeavored to beguile us with the absurd proposition that a newspaper by criticising and condemning an alleged neglect of the law convicts a State and her people of disregarding and violating all law!

Mr. President, I ask with all respect if the humblest human being who walks the earth would be restrained one moment by any intelligent judge in all Christendom upon this testimony? There is not a magistrate or a justice of the peace who would issue a warrant on it. In all judicial history an indictment was never found by a grand jury upon such proof. And yet the American Senate is gravely, passionately, vehemently asked upon such a pretext to condemn one of the fairest States of this Union as disloyal, violent, and lawless. Sir, I cannot, I will not, undertake to argue such a proposition.

Virginia has nearly escaped the common charge made against her sisters. Not one word of evidence has been produced of disloyalty, hostility to the Government, or of any unusual prevalence of crime within her limits.

The honorable Senator from Illinois, it is true, says that "it would not interfere materially with Virginia, whether certain resolutions presented to her Legislature were unconstitutional or not." I cannot restrain my astonishment at this expression. My knowledge that the Senator is eminently patriotic increases my surprise. Virginia indifferent to the Constitution, while she holds in her bosom the ashes and cherishes in her heart the memories of Madison and Marshall! The mother of Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Tyler, Taylor, Scott, Maury, Thomas, the theme for a jest, the subject of a taunt! When the Senator or myself or thousands like us shall have achieved for liberty and glory a shadow of what Virginia has, then a jeer or slur upon her great name may have some grace. Has the Senator forgotten how much this nation owes to Virginia? He must for the moment have forgotten that she had given to the Union the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Had the Senator reflected that his own State was one of the monuments of Virginia's patriotism these words could never have fallen from his lips. Nor, sir, are these a tithe of her contributions to the Republic. She has borne seven Presidents who at the head of the Government have illustrated her devotion to liberty. She has nurtured on her breast the soldiers who have covered yours arms with renown, the sailors who have brightened your flag with honor, the scholars who have extended the conquest of science from the bottom of the sea to the verge of the stars. Her trophies, her memories, her great names, her priceless virtues are before the world; they are the brightest jewels of the Republic, they are the noblest heritages of humanity. I pray the day may never come when the great spirit at Mount Vernon shall not protect her from insult and avert her from error. Her proud sorrows are sublime, and like her glories will be immortal. When she sheathed her sword and returned to the Union her constancy to her national duties and her loyalty to her sister States were renewed with all their original v[illegible]r and truth. Her care for the Constitution and her devotion to [illegible]ights of man had never slumbered. Great State! Whatever is grand [illegible]d patriotic and excellent should be compared to thee. When thy name does not inspire the respect, excite the admiration, and kindle the affections of American patriots the love of liberty and of country will be expiring in our hearts.

The next State in the order of succession as you advance south is North Carolina. I listened with interest to hear what charges were to be made against the good people to whom I owe my position here. For it seems to be the policy and purpose of republican Senators to assail every Southern State that is under democratic government. Knowing the traditions of my State, and that she had always resented and resisted oppression and tyranny under every form, I was not entirely sure but that upon the banks of the Yadkin or Catawba, or in the valleys of the Cape Fear, or among the hills of "Old Bute" and Alamance, or up in the bold mountains where the people partake of the character of their sublime but rugged country the spirit of '76 had flamed out and that their jealous love of liberty had assumed the form it did a hundred years ago. But this anxiety was groundless.

The evidence of disloyalty and lawlessness in North Carolina consisted simply and alone in the fact that the district in which an esteemed friend, Hon. David Schenk, resides and where he was born, and his ancestors for generations before him, had elected that worthy man a judge. Why, sir, there is no more upright, conscientious, honorable man than Judge Schenk. He is a lawyer of eminent ability and attainments, and of the highest moral character and of uncommon general intelligence. Without disparagement let me assure my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] that in all the attributes of a just man, a pure judge, an enlightened patriot Judge Schenk is the peer of the Senator, and I know no higher position to assign him. It is true he belonged to the Ku-Klux organization, he so stated himself, but he expressly avowed that he had never participated in, approved, or sympathized with any unlawful act, and the committee of which my friend from Pennsylvania was the honored chairman believed him. In North Carolina we entertain for the Senator a very high regard; we would be very ungrateful if we did not, for it was chiefly due to his magnanimity that the victims of the Ku-Klux delusion were released from prison. The Senator had been firm and vigilant in his efforts to suppress that organization, but that accomplished, he was as generous and merciful in exerting his just influence for the pardon of the offenders. I am solicitous that my friend should have no unjust impression of our people; and let me inform him that Judge Schenk's character as a lawyer and a man was so high and just that he was voted for by the most prominent republicans in his district, among others by Hon. Rufus Barringer, elector in 1872 on the Grant and Wilson ticket.

I hope I need not say that the other incident alluded to by the Senator was a gross and cruel exaggeration and that the conduct of Judge Schenk was entirely justifiable. I will not tire the Senator with details, but I assure him that the action of the judge in that whole transaction was what his or mine or any proper man's would have been under the circumstances. Mr. President, all excitement in reference to the Ku-Klux organization in North Carolina has been so completely obliterated that the republicans have elected members to the Legislature who once belonged to the Ku-Klux, and our people in their wisdom and magnanimity, without distinction of party have buried that controversy in forgiveness and oblivion forever.

The Senator from Illinois in his ardent crusade against the Southern States paused for a moment as he crossed the limits of North Carolina to discharge at her people a reproach which he will find was quite without foundation. He asked with an air of triumph, in which some tinge of ironical mercy seemed to mingle, "How long has it been since we have had this glorious peace in North Carolina?" "Grant told you that you had to stop, or he would make you do it; and you stopped through fear, not because you desired it." Mr. President, I rejoice that there is peace, profound peace in North Carolina with all her people. The Senator tells the country that it is the peace of "fear," and not the peace of the will, of the reason of the people. Whence, sir, did the Senator derive his opinions of the people of North Carolina, that he should venture the assertion that they act from "fear" and not from their judgment and disposition? Is the history of that brave, true State so little known to the Senator that he could commit this injustice? If he had studied the character of her plain, truthful, fearless people, he could not have so wronged himself as to utter this unjust reproach. Let me for a moment refresh the Senator's historic recollections with some annals of North Carolina and see if I cannot convince him that his censure of that good State was groundless. I will read from an author the most eminent and illustrious of all Americen writers—an author who is no less a scholar than a patriot—who of all others among the living or the dead has done more to illustrate American character and incident, and who I hope may long live to enjoy the serene evening of a nobly passed life. I will now read from Bancroft's AmericanHistory:

The planters of Albemarle were men who had been led to the choice of their residence from a hatred of restraint, and had lost themselves among the woods in search of independence. Are there any who doubt man's capacity for self-government, let them study the history of North Carolina; its inhabitants were restless and turbulent in their imperfect submission to a government imposed on them from abroad; the administration of the colony was firm, humane, and tranquil when they were left to take care of themselves. Any government but one of their own institution was oppressive.—Bancroft's History of the United States, volume 1, page 467.

* * * * * * *

North Carolina was settled by the freest of the free; by men to whom the restraints of other colonies were too severe.

* * * * * * *

But the settlers were gentle in their tempers, of serene minds, enemies to violence and bloodshed. Not all the successive revolutions had kindled vindictive passions; freedom, entire freedom, was enjoyed without anxiety as without guarantees; the charities of life were scattered at their feet, like the flowers of their meadows.—Bancroft's History of the United States. volume 1, page 472.

The people of North Carolina would neither receive a stamp man, nor tolerate the use of a stamp, nor suffer its ports to be closed. The meeting of its Legislature was so long prorogued that it could not join in the application of the Congress; but had there been need of resorting to arms "the whole force of North Carolina was ready to join in protecting the rights of the continent."—Bancroft's History of the United States, volume 5, page 369.

The people of the county of Mecklenburgh had carefully observed the progress of the controversy with Britain; and during the winter political meetings had repeatedly been held in Charlotte. That town had been chosen for the seat of the Presbyterian college, which the Legislature of North Carolina had chartered, but which the king had disallowed, and it was the center of the culture of that part of the province. The number of houses in the village was not more than twenty; but the district was aleady well settled by herdsmen who lived apart on their farms.

Some time in May, 1775, they received the news of the address which in the preceding February had been presented to the king by both houses of Parliament, and which declared the American Colonies to be in a state of actual rebellion. This was to them the evidence that the crisis in American affairs was come, and the people proposed among themselves to abrogate all dependence on the royal authority. But the militia companies were sworn to allegiance; and "how," it was objected, "can we be absolved from our oath?" "The oath," it was answered, "binds only while the king protects." At the instance of Thomas Polk, the commander of the militia of the county, two delegates from each company were called together in Charlotte as a representative committee. Before their consultations had ended the message of the innocent blood shed at Lexington came up from Charleston and inflamed their zeal. They were impatient that their remoteness forbade their direct activity; had it been possible they would have sent a hundred bullocks from their fields to the poor of Boston. No minutes of the committee are known to exist, but the result of their deliberations, framed with superior skill, precision of language, and calm comprehensiveness, remains as the monument of their wisdom and their courage. Of the delegates to that memorable assembly the name of Ephraim Brevard should be remembered with honor by his countrymen. He was one of a numerous family of patriotic brothers, and himself in the end fell a martyr to the public cause. Trained in the college at Princeton, ripened among the brave Presbyterians of Middle Carolina, he digested the system which was then adopted and which in effect was a declaration of independence as well as a complete system of government. "All laws and commissions confirmed by or derived from the authority of the king or Parliament," such are the bold, but well-considered words of these daring statesmen, "are annulled and vacated; all commissions, civil and military, heretofore granted by the Crown to be exercised in the Colonies are void; the provincial congress of each province, under the direction of the great Continental Congress, is invested with all legislative and executive powers within the respective provinces, and no other legislative or executive power does or can exist at this time in any part of these Colonies. As all former laws are now suspended in this province and the Congress has not yet provided others, we judge it necessary for the better preservation of good order to form certain rules and regulations for the internal government of this county until laws shall be provided for us by the Congress."

In accordance with these principles the freemen of the county formed themselves into nine military companies and elected their own officers. Judicial powers were conferred on men to be singled out by the vote of the companies, two from each of them; the whole number of eighteen constituting a court of appeal. The tenure alike of military and civil officers was "the pleasure of their several constituents." All public and county taxes, all quit rents to the Crown were sequestered; and it was voted that persons receiving new commissions from the king or exercising old ones should be dealt with as enemies of the country.

The resolves were made binding on all, and were to be enforced till the provincial congress should provide otherwise, or, what they knew would never take place, till the British Parliament should resign its arbitrary pretensions with respect to America. At the same time the militia companies were directed to provide themselves with arms, and Thomas Polk and Joseph Kenedy were specially appointed to purchase powder, lead, and flints.

Before the month of May had come to an end the resolutions were signed by Ephraim Brevard, as clerk of the committee, and were adopted by the people with the determined enthusiasm which springs from the combined influence of the love of liberty and of religion. Thus was Mecklenburgh County, in North Carolina, separated from the British Empire. The resolves were transmitted with all haste to be printed in Charleston, and they spread through the South, they startled the royal governors of Georgia and North Carolina. They were dispatched by a messenger to the Continental Congress, that the world might know their authors had renounced their allegiance to the King of Great Britain, and had constituted a government for themselves.

The messenger stopped on his way at Salisbury, and there, to a crowd round the court-house, the resolves were read and approved. The western counties were the most populous part of North Carolina; and the royal governor had flattered himself and the king with the fullest assurances of their support. "I have no doubt," said he, "that I might command their best services at a word on any emergency. I consider I have the means in my own hands to maintain the sovereignty of this country to my royal master at all events." And now he was obliged to transmit the deliberate, consistent, and well-considered resolutions of Mecklenburgh, which he described as the "boldest of all," most traitorously declaring the entire dissolution of the laws and constitution, and setting up a system of rule and regulations subversive of His Majesty's government.—Bancroft's History of the United States, volume 1, page 370.

At Wilmington, North Carolina, the sum of two thousand pounds currency was raised in a few days for the relief of Boston; the women of the place gave liberally; Parker Quince offered his vessel to carry a load of provisions freight free, and master and mariners volunteered to navigate her without wages. Lord North had called the American Union a rope of sand; "it is a rope of sand that will hang him," said the people of Wilmington.—Bancroft's History of the United States, volume 1, page 73.

Were these, Mr. President, acts of "fear"? Were these patriots told that they must do this immortal deed? And before the one hundredth anniversary of this unparalleled glory has returned are we to hear in the American Senate that the children of these bold patriots make the peace of "fear"? No, sir, the people of North Carolina fear nothing but to do wrong. They fear God and they have no other fear. Her history is before the world; it is modest and unpretending; her people have preferred to tread the paths of virtue rather than the heights of fame; but they have always done their duty. They love liberty, and they do not fear but they hate tyrants. On her soil the voice of "independence" in America was first raised, and to that great example she will forever stand true. Next to liberty her people love justice; and while they respect law they despise unlawful power. Peace prevails throughout all her borders—the fearless peace of liberty, justice, and law, not the trembling silence of timid slaves nor the breathless stillness of prostrate cowards. The light of peace that shines on North Carolina must come from the sun of liberty; it cannot be reflected from chains or the sword.

Let me assure the honorable Senator from Illinois that he will find nothing in the history of that State, nothing in the character of her people that will not make him yet prouder of the blood that flows in his own veins. Grand in the majesty of her moderation and faithful to all her duties, there she stands in the light of her own great virtues 'without fear and without reproach."

But, Mr. President, are we to be told upon the floor of the American Senate, this forum of the States—yes, sir, in this citadel of the States—for it is in this Chamber that the States are represented as States, equal and coequal, are we to be told here that a great State, one of the original and immortal thirteen, has performed an obligation not from a sense of duty but through fear of the President of the United States? Sir, such sentiments shock me. I can conceive no more melancholy evidence of the decline of liberty and popular government in this country than the prevalence of such expressions. A State in fear of the President and that condition of slavish submission a subject of exultation in the mind of a Senator! Where are we traveling? Are not these the symptoms of approaching despotism? How long will republican liberty survive when the States of this Union stand in awe of the President? The Constitution makes it the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed, but I trust the day is far distant when "fear" is to be one of the attributes of his office. I thought this was a free government of consent, of affection, of interest, and not the stern and iron grasp of force and fear. For the President in his official capacity the American people should hold the high respect, the profound deference, the serious regard for authority that is due to the most exalted office, and to the President as a man the people should extend that homage, reverence, and affection which belongs to the distinguished and patriotic citizen who should possess the most eminent intellectual ability and moral endowment, exerted in the service and for the benefit of his country. But fear is not one of the duties that we should render to the office or to the person of the President. Fear is the prerogative of tyrants and the fealty of slaves. It is not the sentiment of freemen, who should walk the earth and in the image of their Maker look up to heaven with no fear but of Him.

South Carolina is the next Southern State. She has escaped entirely the animadversion of Senators. I rejoice to see that illustrious State enjoy a moment's repose from her persecutions. The inexorable ascendency of the republican party in that State shields her from the criticisms and assaults of its friends in this Chamber. O, that it had protected her wasted and bleeding bosom from the ravages of its spoilsmen at home! Fortunate and thrice happy State. The republican party stands guard over the cradle and the grave of secession. Poverty, exhaustion, and a helpless minority defend you from further ruin. But beware, proud old Commonwealth, mother of Marion, Rutledge, Pinckney, Butler and Hampton how you undertake to throw off the yoke of republican domination. The effort may cost you the penalties that visit Louisiana. He would be too cruel who could say one word to disturb your brief relief from oppression, who could stretch your perishing form on the rack again and arouse the resentments and fears of your sleeping tormentors.

Then comes Tennessee. Why, sir, at the very mention of that name I see the eyes of Senators open wide with the expectation that the overwhelming flood of rebellious proofs will crush the rash friend who undertakes to defend that insurgent State. But what are the facts? Passing from North Carolina into her daughter State, we traverse East Tennessee, we cross Middle Tennessee, we penetrate the western belt of the State to the waters of the Mississippi, and what evidences of the frightful crimes and disorders which are attributed to that State do we find? In one county, in only one of the eighty-five counties in all that broad State, a bloody riot has taken place, in which the laws have been shockingly violated; and the judges, the law officers of the State, the juries, the governor of the State with the authority of his office and personal influence, and the moral sanctions of the people, are all earnestly at work to bring the offenders to justice. Would it be right, just, or safe to charge a whole State with rebellious and desperate crime because a riot had occurred in a single county and the whole judicial, executive, and popular powers of a State were being exerted to punish the perpetrators of the outrage and make them an example to the country? Would it be just or fair if crime did exist in one, two, or three counties of a State holding a million of people, and the whole authority of the State exerted through its proper officers was being employed and employed effectively to suppress and prevent it? Would it be just or fair or honorable to charge the whole State with sweeping lawlessness? In Tennessee the riot has submitted to the laws of the State and the authority of the courts is undisputed and supreme. No intelligent man can doubt that the violated laws will be fully vindicated in their utmost majesty and purity. But, sir, a seal has been set upon the loyalty of Tennessee which our republican friends cannot deny. The Legislature has just returned Andrew Johnson to the United States Senate, whom neither majorities nor tumults nor wars could drive from his support of the Union. With all her daring confederate leaders, the State of Tennessee has sent to the Senate of the country the defender and lover of the Union. Andrew Johnson may be the bold and defiant rebel of a party, but from his unflinching attachment to the Union of the States he has never wavered.

Let us now, Mr. President, turn our attention to Georgia and investigate the temper and condition of her people. We are told by her able and honorable Senators on this floor that they are peaceful and law-abiding, that they recognize their duties to the General Government, submit to its authority, and respect and enforce its laws. These Senators are with and of the people of Georgia. They are supposed to know and do know the sentiments of their constituents. They are supposed to represent, and do most ably represent the opinions, wishes, and I may say interests of their people, and their voice is heard here and heard all over the country declaring that the people of Georgia respect the Constitution of the United States, abide by all of its amendments, and maintain at home order, good government, and general quiet. Have you analyzed the evidence presented to the Senate to support the charge that the State of Geergia is rebellious, disloyal, and oppresses the colored race? That evidence in the aggregate and in the detail consists of an article in a newspaper and a letter from a solitary witness, uncorroborated by any concurrence of testimony from any other reliable or trustworthy source. The Ku-Klux organizations we are told were dissolved in 1870, and now the evidence upon which Senators seriously attempt to impeach the char acter of the empire State of the South is the effusion of one issue of a newspaper and a letter from the unsupported correspondent of a Senator.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?

Will Senators weigh these frail, flimsy, fleeting shadows against the truth of Senators avouched here with all the sanctity and solemnity of their words of honor as Senators? Mr. President, let us pause and behold the pass to which we have come. A State, an organized State, a State of the American Revolution, with a million of people, charged and condemned by the American Senate upon the evidence of a few hasty, heated lines in a newspaper and an unverified letter from a defeated aspirant for office. With all of my respect for the press of the country—and I respect it as the great representative and expression of thought in this age—I cannot denounce the whole people of a State as wicked, violent, and revolutionary upon one editorial; nor, with all the charity that I can exercise, can I consent to damn and degrade them upon the slender statement of one witness who has been unfortunate in running for office.

I rejoice that the beautiful State of Florida seems undisturbed by any of the violent disorders which we are told distress her neighbors. I apprehend from recent, quite recent events that she will continue to become yet more quiet. Our republican friends have not yet made a presentment against the land of flowers and the orange-trees. O no, Mr. President; fifty thousand intelligent, orderly, courteous, respectful visitors of both sexes go from the North, from the rigor of your winter, to find genial repose in the bright sun and balmy air of that lovely State. They come for health and pleasure in the fall, and return in the spring as cheerful and as happy as the birds who make their annual visit to the South. I have heard of no insult, injury, violence, to one of them. They pass through Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia, and return through Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and they bring no reports of offense to them or of crime in the South. And yet we are told that the life of a northern man is not safe in the South.

Mr. President, with the letter of Hon. A. H. BUCKNER, of Missouri, to which I specially invite the attention of the Senate, I shall pass over the State of Alabama. I will now read that letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1875.

SIR: I was much surprised to hear Senator SHERMAN lending the weight of his character to the slander on the people of Louisiana, uttered by General Sheridan, as to the number of murders that had taken place in that State. While it is not stated by these gentlemen that these thousand murders were political assassinations, the charge has no significance unless they design it to be so understood. I venture the opinion that it will be found to be an atrocious misrepresentation, with the smallest amount of truth to support it. I come to this conclusion from the testimony adduced before the Alabama committee appointed by the House of Representatives to investigate the condition of affairs in that State during the late political campaign. You will recollect the letter of Hon. CHARLES HAYS to Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, specifying numerous outrages that had taken place from about the 1st of July to the 15th of September, 1874, and also telegraphic dispatches to the same effect published in the northern papers. The number of murders thus stated as having occurred in the counties of Choctaw, Marengo, Sumter, Pickens, Greene, and Coffee, (all of which are included in Mr. HAYS's congressional district except the last,) and which occurred within the space of two months and a half, amounts to thirty-six, to say nothing of twenty or thirty wounded. With the exception of the murder of Billings and Ivey, in Sumter County—the former a white, and the latter a colored man—there was not a particle of evidence before the committee that any such killings had taken place in either of these counties, and they were proved to be unfounded as far as a negative can be.

I was of the sub-committee that examined witnesses in Sumter County for four days—near the center of these alleged outrages—and with the exceptions I have mentioned no witness stated that any such homicides, or any homicides at all, had occurred in these counties, as stated in the Hawley letter or the telegraphic dispatch referred to. The evidence, now in course of publication, will confirm my statement in every jot and tittle.

But if by murders is to be understood all homicides of every description, including the killing of negroes by negroes, and the justifiable killing of negroes and white men in the perpetration of a felony, such as robbery, arson, burglary, rape, &c., then there may be some semblance of truth in this statement of General Sheridan, indorsed by Senator SHERMAN. I was informed by a gentleman in Montgomery County, Alabama, that at the time we were there the jail of the county contained upward of one hundred prisoners awaiting trial, principally for felony; that all were negroes except one or two, and that there were not less than a dozen murders in that county during the year 1874, and all of them committed by negroes upon negroes. This county has a large republican majority and has been entirely under the control of the negroes since reconstruction. I apprehend that a thorough investigation as to these thousand murders in Louisiana will show that at least four-fifths of all that have been committed have no political significance whatever, which General Sheridan knows, if Senator SHERMAN does not.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

A. H. BUCKNER.

Hon. A. G. THURMAN.

Judge BUCKNER, an honored member of the House of Representatives, was one of a committee sent by the House to investigate the condition of the State of Alabama. From his letter it will be seen that the crimes in Alabama are mostly committed by the negroes. This evidence may be regarded as having all the force of official impression.

In reference to Mississippi, there is no evidence of any violence by the white people except in the city of Vicksburgh. The events there have been laid before the country, and I hardly think the people of an entire State should be condemned and the State itself be "disestablished" for the act of a hundred men in one place. For three years in the great State of Mississippi there has been one riot which is charged, justly or unjustly I shall not determine, on her white people. Where is the evidence of widespread conspiracy, rebellion, and murder against the Government and the friends of the Union?

As to the State of Arkansas, I beg to refer the Senate to the very able report of the committee of the House, of which Judge POLAND, of Vermont, who once with no ordinary distinction held a seat in this Chamber, is the chairman. I will read from Mr. POLAND'S report:

The new constitution we regard as republican in form, and in many respects an improvement upon that of 1868. Some question has been made as to the dropping from the declaration of principles some of the professions of loyalty contained in the old constitution. Most of the reconstruction constitutions contained rather a surplusage on that subject. We think the substance has been retained.

The committee are satisfied that the convention to frame the constitution, and the constitution itself, were voted for and are satisfactory to the majority of the voters and people of the State. The State officers were certainly elected by a majority of votes cast, and we think by a majority of the votes in the State. The condition of the State has been as peaceful since the new government was inaugurated as it ever has been; acts of violence have been very few indeed. It is alleged that this is all because they are now under congressional investigation and on their "good behavior."

The committee believe that in Arkansas the mass of the people on both sides are inclined to peace and good government, and to allow all the enjoyment of their legal rights; but there are a class of men, the

* * * * * * *

Your committee cannot find any solid ground on which to stand to say the General Government can or ought to interfere; and no amount of irregularity in the processes by which this state of things was brought about furnish just reason for doing so. The committee believe that, upon principles now well established, all these defects and irregularities in the proceedings must be regarded as cured by the verdict of the people.

It will be seen that since the overthrow of the attempted usurpation of Brooks and the establishment of a just and conservative government in that State, quiet and tranquillity prevail, the law is maintained, and liberty enjoyed.

I have inquired with some concern of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Texas in reference to the condition of their people. I am informed that the people of that State are enjoying a high degree of prosperity. Both of her Senators inform me that their State is annually receiving an immigration estimated at two hundred thousand souls. What better testimony of the prosperity of a people and their peaceful and law-abiding habits and their respect for the Government and their tolerance of northern opinions than the established fact that from one to two hundred thousand settlers, largely from the Northern States, annually find homes among them?

And now, we approach the State of Louisiana. Yes, I say the State of Louisiana. You remember her, I remember her as a State; and we hope she may yet be a State. Yes, prostrated, disfranchised, an armed soldiery holding her capital, she is still a State; and no power on earth can deprive her of her rights, powers, position as a State; neither her own suicidal hand nor all the powers of the United States combined. If there is anything true in the theory and principles of this Government, it is that the existence of a State is as indestructible as the Government itself; but, I will not now discuss this question. We are told that "bloody treason flourishes" all over that once proud and happy State; the domination of a white minority over a black majority; the intimidations of a black majority supported by the Army and upheld by the patronage of the United States Government, by a white minority restrained, arrested, depressed by that same Army and influence. There have been bloody riots committed in Louisiana. I do not defend them; but let us examine them, their numbers and their magnitude. We should no doubt differ about their causes and origin. We are told by Senators that the "whole people are in revolt" and that there are "seas of blood," "thousands of murders" there.

I invoke the attention of the Senate. There have occurred in the State of Louisiana since the election in 1868 a riot at Colfax, a riot at Coushatta, and the revolution against the Kellogg usurpation at New Orleans. I accept the statement of republican Senators. Three riots, if you will, in that State since 1868, disconnected with each other, occurring in widely separated districts, under entirely different circumstances, and neither having any reference to any election that was to succeed it—no common interest between them. Upon this statement of fact, we are asked, seriously asked, to pronounce that the people of Louisiana are in armed rebellion and conspiring to overthrow the national authority and all government and substitute anarchy and "the slave power."

Against all of these charges, against all this denunciation, against all this cry of "organized political crime," against and as everlasting answer and refutation and rebuke of its cruel injustice, I present one paragraph from the calm, able, patriotic report of Messrs. FOSTER, PHELPS, and POTTER, the sub-committee of the House of Representatives sent to see and hear for themselves the facts in Louisiana. Here is what they say:

Indeed, in our judgment the substantial citizens of the State will submit to any fair determination of the question of the late elections, or to anything by which they can secure a firm and good government. What they seek is peace and an opportunity for prosperity; to that end they will support any form of government that will afford them just protection in their business and personal relations. In their distress they have got beyond any mere question of political party. They regard themselves as practically without government and without the power to form one.

To that statement I call your attention and the attention of the American people. "In their distress they have got beyond any mere question of political party." In these few words there is an eloquence of argument and fact far above the power of speech. What must be the extent, the depth, the agony of that "distress" which goes far "beyond political party." It is the "distress" of homes, for families, for life, for liberty. It is the "distress" which only those can feel who on the deck of some burning and sinking vessel, amid the despairing faces and prayers of wives and children, hear the last signal-gun that tells them they are going down to rise no more.

I have thus attempted at the peril of being very tedious to review the condition of the Southern States in the light which the evidence furnished by the republican party presents it. I think I may with candor rest the case of the South here without pleading her immense defenses, her overwhelming justifications, her mitigations of nature that appeal with the force of justice to the universal sense of right and reason of mankind.

In thus vindicating the Southern States let me not be misunderstood. I have done so from an anxious desire to dispel the imputations against them. But it is not the duty nor the right of any Senator to institute an inquisition into the character or conduct of any State of this Union. The Constitution defines the duties of the United States in this respect, but it has not made and I trust never will make Congress an inquisitorial court to investigate the States. Sir, is the Senate to become the star chamber of the Republic, in which States are to be immolated and their people put on the rack? Was it for this that these columns were reared, that this emblazoned roof pours down its gilded light on our heads? If this is to be, Senators, let us leave this Chamber and with stooping and muffled forms descend to the gloomy and dismal basement of the Capitol, there to revive the examples of Venice.

Consider the condition of the Southern States immediately after the war and what a spectacle do we behold! There were twelve States embracing an area of over eight hundred thousand square miles, larger than Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Austria, Switzerland, Belgium, and Holland combined, with a population of twelve millions, two-thirds of which were whites and one third recent slaves. The peace in 1865 succeeded a frightful civil war of four years' duration in which over a million and a half of men were engaged in armed conflict and all the terrible passions of sectional strife were excited. The war ended with an upheaval and transformation unprecedented in all time. Systems as old as the settlement of the country and deeply rooted in the very foundations of the structure of the South were suddenly subverted and abolished; government, society, the established order of labor and capital, the organic laws of States, their relations to the General Government, and the whole frame-work of material, moral, social, and political proportion were overturned and demolished.

I recall in all history no example of such complicated wreck and confusion. Four millions of slaves, one-half the population, totally unfitted for self-government, were suddenly set at liberty and invested with all political power. A great army had dissolved, and its soldiers, accustomed to the camp for years, returned to their homes to find them in ashes and their country without fixed laws. And for years, either from adverse seasons or mistaken husbandry or capricious labor, or all combined, the very earth refused her beneficent increase to our stricken people.

Unfenced desolation
Had left us as naked as the vulgar air.

I will not lift the veil from the picture of our social suffering. There was not a board in all our land that had not fasted; there was not a fireside in all the South from which some loved face was not missing; there was not a heart in all the South that had not bled. Senators, may you and your prosperous people never learn by your own experience the extremity of our afflictions. I have thought how to describe it; I am powerless to do it justice with speech.

I speak the simple truth when I declare that had I seen at the conclusion of the war the sea of dark and bitter troubles through which we had to pass, I should have despaired of the fate of my country and regarded the continuance of life as a doubtful blessing. A people exhausted by war and broken down by anguish were to try again the experiment of self-government for themselves. They were to test the capacity of a new race for self-government, they were to determine the question of labor in all its forms, and they were to conduct these trials at the same time and on the same field with that other grander trial of the capacity of different races to live together in harmony as political equals. These were some of the difficulties the South had to confront. And, Mr. President, had you then done as you ought to have done—and I must say right here what I do think—had you extended your right hand to the South in this hour of sorest trial, had you treated her people with magnanimity, had you given them your confidence as countrymen and brothers, the attachment and the gratitude of that people to you and the Union would have been boundless.

But Senators remind us of the magnanimity of the Government. Holding that quality to be the crown of all the virtues, I should be pleased to recognize it in the conduct of the Government toward the Southern States. It has been exercised in all our relations with others; it has been manifested toward the Indians; it has been manifested toward all our feebler neighbors; it has expressed itself in sympathy for all the oppressed people of the earth. But was it magnanimous, was it wise or politic, when the South was in the condition I have just described, to extort from her poverty a cotton tax of $70,000,000, now almost universally admitted to be unconstitutional? Was it magnanimous, wise, or politic, in your amendments to the Constitution, while you bestowed all political and civil rights on those who had been our slaves to disfranchise without discrimination every human being in the South who had ever been trusted by his people? And, let me ask the Senate of the United States if it is magnanimous, grateful, patriotic, or honorable to deny to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 who live in the South the pension of the Government? Sir, in this debate we have heard much of Jackson and the glory of New Orleans, and the heart of the nation swells with gratitude and pride when the 8th of January, 1815, is mentioned. Is it possible that the brave comrades of Jackson on that glorious day, now past four score years, tottering to their graves, are dishonored by the country they gave their blood to defend? Senators, let not this reproach longer dishonor the justice, gratitude, and glory of the American people. This is not the magnanimity that conquers hearts.

But let it be recorded to the imperishable and transcendent glory of the South that amid all this ruin, revolution, eclipse, and darkness her great people, as a people, never once lost their self-control, forgot their duty, violated their moderation, or broke any of the restraints of law or honor. But let it also be written to their undying and supreme renown that amid these speechless calamities they have cherished and preserved in unquenchable light their love of liberty and constitutional freedom. Sir, in all history has there been anything like it? Look at the civil wars of Marius and Sylla, and behold their fires smothered to-day but to burst out to-morrow in wilder flames and deeper streams of blood. Look at the thirty years' war of our great ancestry—the houses of York and Lancaster. Read the account of the recent "commune" in Paris after the peace with Germany, in which in three months ninety thousand Frenchmen were slain by their own countrymen before the passions of war would subside. And then turn and behold the "great southern ocean," when the storm had ended, become, with all its power and depths, almost as calm as when the "Sea of Galilee" responded to the Spirit of Peace.

Is it remarkable, that over this vast deep, stirred by the storm of war and strewed with the wrecks of so many institutions, institutions of ages, there should be left some agitation? Is it not more remarkable that there has been so little disturbance; that the great waves of war and passion have so soon and so universally subsided? And are these disturbances and outbreaks to be taken as proofs of general dissatisfaction and violence? We might as well fear that because the volcanoes on the Andes occasionally burst out, the great central fires were about to break their earthbound cerements. Crimes have been committed in the South; crimes sometimes of a horrid character. I condemn and denounce them; wherever the violence, the terror, the tyranny of numbers has prevailed over the weak and defenseless, I utterly abhor and execrate it. I have no sympathy with crime in any shape it may assume. For the authors of these crimes I have no toleration. They have accomplished no good. It is impossible under the providence of a just Ruler that crime can accomplish good. But they have brought unjust, cruel reproach and aspersion upon whole communities. Mobs, combined lawless numbers, are not of or with the South. In the name of the courage, manliness, and truth which distinguish the name of "southerner" over the civilized world, I repudiate and disown such disgraceful acts as utterly abhorrent to our sentiments and character. Senators can have no conception of the gross and cruel injustice they perpetrate against the South by the charge that any considerable, any respectable portion of our people can be guilty of such infamous offenses. I have already demonstrated that such is not the fact. The world knows it is not.

But, sir, if we feel proper indignation against the perpetration of crime in the case of individuals, what must be our abhorrence and scorn for the authors and agents of that system of gigantic crime which spread wide over the whole Southern States, and at one time threatened to involve in general ruin not only political liberty, but all the safeguards of civilized society. If we feel just and stern indignation against the massacre at Coushatta, or Colfax, or Trenton, what must be our surprise and passion when we behold the State of Louisiana, with her half million of people, the helpless victim of a deliberate, systematic, organized, and accomplished conspiracy, which has destroyed the value of her lands, broken down the credit of her stocks, paralyzed her commerce, annihilated her industries, prostituted her laws, prostrated every honest interest in her limits, trampled on her liberties, and brought down her proud name to the dust. What crime can be greater than the destruction of a State, whether accomplished by the armed soldiery of the nation in the capital of the State or perpetrated by the slower processes of the poisons of corruption? Nor, sir, can this high crime be mitigated by denunciation, abuse, calumniation of the people of Louisiana. The attempt by the authors of these calamities to tarnish, to blacken, to mutilate the character of the unhappy and distressed people whom they have despoiled and oppressed proves the "guilt of their own great quell." The ancient Carthaginians cut off the eyelids of the noblest Roman and exposed him to the blazing sun until he perished because he had not betrayed his own nor his country's honor; but amid their tortures the barbarians applauded the virtue and patriotism of Regulus, and erected on the plains near their city a trophy to his memory. The countrymen of Hannibal admired the stern integrity their cruelty could not shake; their savage policy inflicted the rack, but their sense of justice honored the duty that survived it. In Louisiana we have witnessed the rapacity and cruelty that could strip and starve its prostrate victims, accompanied with the infamy that sought to destroy the character it had vainly tried to corrupt.

And now, Mr. President, I submit to a candid country if there is any just ground in the condition or conduct of the southern people to justify the interference of the Army with the Legislature at New Orleans.

Louisiana was first admitted as a State in this Union on the 8th of April, 1812, and again readmitted under the reconstruction acts on June 25, 1868. She is a State, her Representatives are in Congress, the United States courts are over her people, the jurisdiction of national laws extends throughout her limits, she is in all the elements recognized by the Constitution a State in this Union. In November, 1872, a general election for all State officers and members of Congress was held in that State, and the conservative party elected their ticket by a majority of about ten thousand votes. On the night of the 5th of December following, under color of a void order issued at midnight by a corrupt and profligate judge, supported by regiments of the United States Army moving before the dawn of day, a fraudulent and usurped State government was imposed upon the people of Louisiana. I will read from the report of Messrs. PHELPS, FOSTER, and POTTER:

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislature abolishing existing courts and judges, and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws, centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia, subject to the command of the governor; by the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, water-works, and ferries, cleaning vaults and removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with elective judges, and the substitution of other courts, with judges appointed by Kellogg, in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks issued during the years 1870 and 1872; by laws declaring that no person in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have served to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

I will also read from the report of Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE, three distinguished republicans of the House of Representatives:

On the other hand, the order of Judge Durell and the so-called canvass made by the returning board in the interest of Kellogg seem to us to have no validity and to be entitled to no respect whatever. We concede and declare, as emphatically as any person can desire, the unsatisfactory character of the methods adopted for arriving at this conclusion. There is, in our judgment, whatever may be the opinion one may form from the statement of men familiar with the campaign of 1872, or from the registration of white and colored voters, no legal evidence whatever which will warrant the declaration that either Kellogg or McEnery was lawfully elected.

I will further read from the report of the Committee of the Senate on Privileges and Elections, then composed entirely of republicans:

3. Conceding the board was in existence, and had full authority to canvass the returns, it had no returns to canvass.

The returns from the parishes had been made, under the law of 1870, to the governor, and not one of them was before the Lynch board.

It was testified before your committee by Mr. Bovee himself, who participated in this canvass by the Lynch board, that they were determined to have a republican Legislature, and made their canvass to that end. The testimony abundantly establishes the fraudulent character of their canvass. In some cases they had what were supposed to be copies of the original returns, in other cases they had nothing but newspaper statements, and in other cases, where they had nothing whatever to act upon, they made an estimate, based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the parish, of what the vote ought to have been. They also counted a large number of affidavits purporting to be sworn to by voters who had been wrongfully denied registration or the right to vote, many of which affidavits they must have known to be forgeries. It was testified by one witness that he forged over a thousand affidavits, and delivered them to the Lynch board while it was in session. It is quite unnecessary to waste time in considering this part of the case; for no person can examine the testimony ever so cursorily without seeing that this pretended canvass had no semblance of integrity.

It has never been pretended by any intelligent or respectable man that Kellogg received a majority of the votes cast in Louisiana in 1872. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] does insist that, by an "estimate" of what he imagines the vote ought to have been, according to the census of the State and upon the "line of color," Kellogg was elected. But that Senator has never asserted that Kellogg had any legal expression or sanction of an election.

Upon this question I refer to the message of the President to the Senate in reply to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN:]

It has been bitterly and persistently alleged that Kellogg was not elected. Whether he was or not is not altogether certain, nor is it any more certain that his competitor, McEnery, was chosen. The election was a gigantic fraud, and there are no reliable returns of its result. Kellogg obtained possession of the office, and in my opinion has more right to it than his competitor.

Thus a State government was imposed upon the people of Louisiana and has been continued over them for more than two years against their expressed will and by the fraud of a Federal judge, sustained by the Army of the United States. The facts deposed before the Committee on Privileges and Elections develop a system of glaring and disgraceful fraud without any parallel in the annals of political crime. In 1874 the people of that oppressed State again with determined patriotism entered the canvass and carried the election in November by an acknowledged majority of the popular vote, and returned a majority of twenty-nine conservative members to the house of representatives of the State Legislature; and again a corrupt and fraudulent returning board undertook to defeat the popular will and actually reverse the majority in the house of representatives.

I beg to refer to the report of the committee of the House again on this subject:

Whereas both branches of the Legislature of Louisiana have requested the special committee of this House to investigate the circumstances attending the election and returns thereof in that State for the year 1874; and whereas said committee have unanimously reported that the returning board of that State, in canvassing and compiling said returns and promulgating the result, wrongfully applied an erroneous rule of law, by reason whereof persons were awarded seats in the house of representatives of Louisiana to which they were not entitled and persons entitled to seats were deprived of them:

Resolved, That it is recommended to the house of representatives of Louisiana to take immediate steps to remedy said injustice and to place the persons rightfully entitled in their seats.

By which it will be seen that a clear, manifest, undeniable majority in the house of representatives was overthrown by the action of the Kellogg returning board. I also read from the same report to show that the election in November, 1874, was fair, lawful, peaceful:

We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

It will thus appear from the report unanimously made by the committee of seven, composed of five republicans and two democrats, that the conservatives elected a majority of members to the house of representatives in the State of Louisiana, and that the Kellogg returning board undertook to unlawfully supplant that conservative majority, and actually returned a roll giving to the republicans a majority in that house.

On the morning of the 4th of January the Legislature was to convene and organize in the State-house at New Orleans. One hundred and two members who were returned on the roll of the returning board assembled in the legislative hall, of whom fifty-two were republicans and fifty democrats, and with them five members who had the parish certificates, prima facie evidence of their election, and who had not been rejected or enrolled by the returning board. After a temporary organization of the house the five members were admitted to seats in the chamber and Mr. Wiltz was elected speaker. Against the admission of the five members and the organization of the house with Mr. Wiltz as speaker there was earnest protest from the republican members. And then occurred a scene which has but few precedents in the history of free governments, and these all conspicuous for the calamities which succeeded them.

General De Trobriand, an officer of the United States Army, in the uniform of his country, entered the legislative hall of the State of Louisiana, and with a file of soldiers with fixed bayonets ejected from their seats five persons sitting as members of that body. There is the simple statement of the facts. The Army of the United States enters the hall of a State Legislature and expels its seated members. Is it necessary to comment on the character of the act? When the day comes, and I pray it never may, that such a deed fails to strike the American people with amazement and indignant horror, our liberty will already have perished. There is no danger to our free institutions which the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of all the States guard with so much vigilance as that which must always arise in a free government when the military interferes with the civil authority. And, sir, let it be forever kept in mind that this jealousy of the civil government is just, for it cannot be too watchful against the ambitions of military power. The constitution of every State protects this fundamental vital principle, without which there can be no civil government. This principle is the foundation, the life of all representative government. Strike it down, and nothing remains but military despotism. Its subversion is the end of liberty and the establishment of arbitrary power. That is what it is.

As a Senator from North Carolina I feel instructed to protest against all military interference with the civil authority. That State for years has had, in addition to her constitutional provision, on her statute-books this law.

21. It shall not be lawful to call or direct any regimental, battalion, or company muster on election days, or to assemble armed men on the day of election at any place appointed by law to hold elections for electors, governor, members of Congress, or members of the General Assembly, under the penalty of $1,000, to be recovered of any person who shall call such muster or assemble such armed men, and applied one-half to the use of the informer and the other half to the use of the State.—Revised Code of North Carolina, 308, 309.

And to her honor let it be known that during the civil war her military officers, her governor, and her State officials, all her people respected the writ of habeas corpus. In looking back over a life now approaching its meridian, I recall no incident of a public character that gives me more pleasure than when surrounded by thousands of armed troops I felt it to be my duty to obey that writ and surrender to the unarmed officer of the law a conscripted soldier from the army. So jealous has North Carolina ever been of her liberties.

Among all the safeguards of a free government there is not and there cannot be one more essential and more sacred than the right which the Constitution of the United States secures to each House of Congress and the constitution of every State secures to each branch of a State Legislature, that—

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

The nature of this power has been well discussed by Mr. Reverdy Johnson—and when I have mentioned that name in connection with constitutional law I will say no more. I will use his words. He says:

It is a power essential to legislative freedom. The history of the legislative department of Great Britain shows that this power, after various struggles with kings and lords, secured its permanent place in Parliament and has never since been called into question. If the Legislature cannot delegate the power, still less can it be exercised by the Executive, State or Federal. To suffer it to be done by either would be to divest the Legislature of a power essential to its own integrity. To permit the executive of a State to purge the legislative halls of members whom he may suppose not to have been elected would be not less fatal to the very end of such a department than to give him the power to select its members. And to authorize the President so to interfere would be a total violation of the powers admitted to belong to the States, and of the limited powers conferred upon the General Government.

It will do us no harm to glance for a moment at the history of this great legislative right and see with what care our English ancestors have established and preserved it. I will read a short extract from Hallam's Constitutional History, a book which I commend alike to statesmen and American soldiers:

Nothing further appears on record till in 1586 the house appointed a committee to examine the state and circumstances of the returns for the county of Norfolk. The fact was, that the chancellor had issued a second writ for this county, on the ground of some irregularity in the first return, and a different person had been elected. Some notice having been taken of this matter in the Commons, the speaker received orders to signify to them Her Majesty's displeasure that "the house had been troubled with a thing impertinent for them to deal with, and only belonging to the charge and office of the lord chancellor, whom she had appointed to confer with the judges about the returns for the county of Norfolk, and to act therein according to justice and right." The house, in spite of this peremptory inhibition, proceeded to nominate a committee to examine into and report the circumstances of these returns, who reported the whole case with their opinion, that those elected on the first writ should take their seats, declaring further that they understood the chancellor and some of the judges to be of the same opinion; but that "they had not thought it proper to inquire of the chancellor what he had done, because they thought it prejudicial to the privilege of the house to have the same determined by others than such as were members thereof. And though they thought very reverently of the said lord chancellor and judges, and knew them to be competent judges in their places; yet in this case they took them not for judges in Parliament in this house; and thereupon required that the members, if it was so thought good, might take their oaths and be allowed of by force of the first writ as allowed by the censure of this house, and not as allowed of by the said lord chancellor and judges. Which was agreed unto by the whole house."—Hallam's Constitutional History of England, volume 1, pages 274, 275.

There is an example of the independence of the English House of Commons and of the respect which Queen Elizabeth, the daughter of the haughty Tudors, rendered to a majesty greater than the throne. Shall the Army of the American Republic exhibit a disregard for the constitutional privilege of a Legislature which the proudest sovereign who ever wore the crown of Great Britain dared not infringe?

But we have been told on this floor that the expelled persons were not members of that Legislature and that they had no right to the seats which they occupied. Sir, is the Senate, is the general commanding the United States troops, is the governor of Louisiana, is the President of the United States, to judge that question? No, sir; no. That question belonged by the constitution of Louisiana exclusively to the house of representatives itself, and we have no power to decide it here. Our right and duty to judge the elections, qualifications, and returns of Senators in this Chamber is not more exclusive. But there are proofs, strong, positive, certain that the conservatives had elected a large majority of that house and that the act of the returning board in undertaking to defeat that majority was unlawful and corrupt. I again call attention to the report of the committee of the House of Representatives and their resolution which I have already quoted.

The committee unanimously recommend "that immediate steps be taken to remedy said injustice and to place the persons rightfully entitled to their seats." Are we to hear after this expression of an able and patriotic committee that the soldiery of the United States which unseated and expelled lawful members of a State Legislature was only suppressing a riot, was putting down domestic violence, was quelling an insurrection? Was the convention of a Legislature "duly, peaceably, quietly elected by the people" a riot, domestic violence, or an armed insurrection? Sir, such a question is not susceptible of argument. It cannot bear the light. Is not the origin, the cause, the fountain of all this wrong in the corrupt, willful, wicked conspiracy of the returning board to defraud the people of Louisiana out of their second election? And was not the Army used, in the words of Kellogg, "to clear the hall and State-house of all persons not returned as legal members of the house of representatives by the returning board? Of this returning board the committee of the House say:

We understand the committee to be unanimous in finding the fact that the action of the returning board has defeated the will of the people as expressed by them at the polls on the 3d of November, 1874. The people then elected to the lower house of their Legislature a majority of conservative members; a portion of the conservative members thus elected were refused their certificates. This is an act of great injustice to the individuals, of gravest danger to the State and free government, and ought to be immediately corrected by any power competent to correct it.

* * * * * * *

Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house.

And, sir, what do we now witness?

We hold, therefore, that in November, 1874, the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

And then we behold the Army of the United States used to sustain "the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board" by expelling members from the legislative hall because they had not been returned by that board.

And we witness further, now when days and weeks have passed since that interference by the military, these same members excluded from the hall and the injustice thus continued. Is this violation of the most sacred rights of a State of this Union to be perpetuated? Is a usurping Legislature sustained in authority by the United States Army to make laws for the people of Louisiana, and are the people expected to obey and respect their acts? The usurpers in Louisiana may well exclaim with the bloody Dane:

Forgive me my foul murder!
That cannot be; since I am still possess'd
Of those effects for which I did the murder,
My crown, mine own ambition, and my queen.
May one be pardon'd, and retain the offense?

No, sir, the smallest remedy that is due the violated constitution of that State and her outraged people and the just sentiment of American freemen is to allow the rightful members of the Legislature to assemble in the capitol and discharge their legislative duty. I protest against this continuing wrong, and every hour of its existence increases its enormity and solidifies its despotism. Its inception may have been a blunder, its prolongation is the greatest crime.

In the light of these facts what becomes of the argument that the Army of the United States was used to suppress a riot? When the soldiers entered that hall there was quiet and order within its walls. All disturbances had ceased and legislative duties were being actually performed. Mr. President, there was a way, a safe, constitutional, just mode of composing all the difficulties of that day. If the returning board instead of acting "unjustly, illegally, and arbitrarily" had discharged their duty fairly, justly, legally, there would have been no trouble in that State-house. But that board corrupts, perverts, suppresses the just returns from the election, and when the conservatives in spite of the desperate action of the board succeed in securing the organization of the house, the military power of the General Government is invoked to consummate the usurpation the board had begun. Where was the riot? With whom, between whom, and by whom was it made? In the legislative hall there were not one hundred conservatives—citizens, members of the Legislature and its officials—men of all ages. Was it their purpose to commit a riot? No. They had but an hour before called on the millitary to restore order among their opponents and their followers. How was that riot to be suppressed? Order had been once restored upon the simple appearance of General De Trobriand. I apprehend that the learned jurists of the country to whom the Senator from New York referred so eloquently will think it rather a novel method of quelling a riot by ejecting with bayonets five members of a State Legislature from the seats they were quietly holding. The idea of a riot by the conservatives in that hall and on that day is simply impossible. The State-house was surrounded by eighteen hundred United States soldiers; charged cannon commanded the streets of the city, and the guns of armed vessels of war in the river were trained upon all the approaches to the capitol. The State-house was encircled with lines of bayonets. A riot in that hall was impossible. The purpose was to eject the five members, to turn the Legislature over to the republicans and to complete the usurpation commenced by the returning board. Is there a rational man on the face of the earth who can doubt that this was the purpose, who does not know that a simple word from the officer in command to "keep the peace" would have maintained order; and are any so blind as to imagine that that feeble band of conservatives so environed could contemplate violence? Sir, I will pursue this line of argument no further. The riot has been suppressed now for six weeks but the five expelled members are still excluded from the Legislature.

But the honorable Senator from Ohio says that "to call this one of those great historic outrages where the rights of a whole people are trampled upon is simply making a mountain out of a molehill." I have great respect for the candor of that Senator, but he must pardon the same candor in me when I say that I fear he looks upon this event in Louisiana in a very different light from that in which he would view it in Ohio or New York. I fear Senators do not yet fully realize that the Southern States are States of this Union, with all the duties and all the rights of their northern sisters. I wish I could see armed intervention in Louisiana as the Senator sees, and that his was the true view. I pray that it may not prove one of those great eclipses which have rarely occurred in history to overshadow free government. In my opinion that will depend upon the courage of Congress and the patriotism of the American people. I think it will not be unprofitable to the Senator and to the people to review those remarkable examples in history which have preceded the tragedy in Louisiana. I will read the account given by Hallam of the usurpation of Charles I, when he invaded the British House of Commons:

The following account of the king's coming to the house on this occasion is copied from the pencil notes of Sir R. Verney. It has been already printed by Mr. Hatsell, but with no great correctness. What Sir R. Verney says of the transactions of January 3 is much the same as we read in the journals. He thus proceeds:

"TUESDAY, January 4, 1641.

"The five gentlemen which were to be accused came into the house, and there was information that they should be taken away by force. Upon this the house sent to the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council to let them know how their privileges were likely to be broken and the city put into danger, and advised them to look to their security.

"Likewise some members were sent to the inns of court, to let them know how they heard they were tampered withal to assist the king against them, and therefore they desired them not to come to Westminster.

"Then the house adjourned to one of the clock."

As soon as the house met again, it was moved, considering there was an intention to take these five members away by force, to avoid all tumult let them be commanded to absent themselves; upon this the house gave them leave to absent themselves, but entered no order for it. And the five gentlemen went out of the house.

A little after the king came with all his guard, and all his pensioners, and two or three hundred soldiers and gentlemen. The king commanded the soldiers to stay in the hall, and sent us word he was at the door. The speaker was commanded to sit still with the mace lying before him, and then the king came to the door, and took the palsgrave in with him, and commanded all that came with him upon their lives not to come in. So the doors were kept open, and the Earl of Roxburgh stood within the door, leaning upon it. Then the king came upward toward the chair with his hat off, and the speaker stepped out to meet him; then the king stepped up to his place and stood upon the step, but sat not down in the chair.

And after he had looked a great while he told us he would not break our privileges, but treason had no privilege; he came for those five gentlemen, for he expected obedience yesterday, and not an answer. Then he called Mr. Pym and Mr. Hollis by name, but no answer was made. Then he asked the speaker if they were here or where they were? Upon this the speaker fell on his knees and desired his excuse, for he was a servant to the house, and had neither eyes nor tongue to see or say anything but what they commanded him; then the king told him he thought his own eyes were as good as his, and then said his birds had flown, but he did expect the house should send them to him; and if they did not, he would seek them himself, for their treason was foul, and such a one as they would all thank him to discover; then he assured us they should have a fair trial; and so went out, pulling off his hat till he came to the door. Upon this the house did instantly resolve to adjourn till to-morrow at one of the clock, and in the interim they might consider what to do.—Hallam's Constitutional History of England, volume 2, pages 125, 126.

Does the Senator discover no coincidence with the recent event in New Orleans? While the principal incidents of the two events are concurrent, does the Senator discover no painful similitude in the exact days of the month and the week and the ominous number of the five expelled members; the same month, January; the same day of the month, the 4th; the same day of the week, Tuesday; the same number expelled, five. Slight as these circumstances are, I trust they may make sufficient impression on our minds to warn us against the fatal consequences that followed that unhappy mistake of the best of the Stuarts. Hallam says:

But the single false step which rendered his affairs irretrievable by anything asort of civil war, and placed all reconciliation at an insuperable distance, was his attempt to seize the five members within the walls of the house; an evident violation, not of common privilege, but of all security for the independent existence of Parliament in the mode of its execution, and leading to a very natural though perhaps mistaken surmise that the charge itself of high treason made against these distinguished leaders, without communicating any of its grounds, had no other foundation than their parliamentary conduct.—Hallam's Constitutional History of England, volume 2, pages 125, 126.

I will now read from Hume's history his graphic account of the dissolution of that Parliament, the most distinguished of all others for its vicissitudes of glory and shame, by the usurper Cromwell:

Cromwell, in a rage, immediately hastened to the house and carried a body of three hundred soldiers along with him. Some of them he placed at the door, some in the lobby, some on the stairs. He first addressed himself to his friend St. John, and told him that he had come with a purpose of doing what grieved him to the very soul, and what he had earnestly with tears besought the Lord not to impose upon him, but there was a necessity, in order to the glory of God and good of the nation. He sat down for some time and heard the debate. He beckoned Harrison, and told him that he now judged the Parliament rife for a dissolution. "Sir," said Harrison, "the work is very great and dangerous. I desire you seriously to consider before you engage in it." "You say well," replied the general; and thereupon sat still about a quarter of an hour. When the question was ready to be put he said again to Harrison, "This is the time; I must do it." And suddenly starting up, he loaded the Parliament with the vilest reproaches for their tyranny, ambition, oppression, and robbery of the public. Then stamping with his foot, which was a signal for the soldiers to enter, "For shame," said he to the Parliament; "get you gone; give place to honest men; to those who will more faithfully discharge their trust. You are no longer a Parliament. I tell you you are no longer a Parliament. The Lord has done with you; he has chosen other instruments for carrying on his work." Sir Harry Vane exclaiming against this proceeding, he cried with a loud voice, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!"

* * * * * * * *

Having commanded the soldiers to clear the hall, he himself went out last, and ordering the doors to be locked, departed to his lodgings in Whitehall.—Hume's History of England, volume 7, pages 192. 193.

And now, coming down to a period nearer our own times, I will draw the attention of the Senate and the country to another scene of military interference with a representative assembly of the people. I read from Thier's French Revolution:

At this moment Bonaparte heard outside the scene that was passing in the Assembly. He was alarmed for his brother, and sent ten grenadiers to bring him out of the hall. The grenadiers entered, found Lucien encompassed by a group, laid hold of him by the arm, saying that it was by his brother's orders, and hurried him away. The moment had arrived for taking a decisive step. If there was any wavering all would be lost. Rhetorical means for working upon the Assembly having become impracticable, no alternative was left but force. It was requisite to hazard one of those daring acts before which usurpers always hesitate. Cæsar hesitated before he passed the Rubicon, Cromwell before he turned out the Parliament. Bonaparte determined to march his grenadiers against the Assembly. He mounted his horse, with Lucien, and rode along the front of the troops. Lucien harangued them. "The Council of the Five Hundred is dissolved," said he; "it is I that tell you so. Assassins have taken possession of the hall of meeting and have done violence to the majority; I summon you to march and to clear it of them." Lucien afterward swore that himself and his brother would be the faithful defenders of liberty. Murat and Leclerc then took a battalion of grenadiers and conducted it to the door of the Five Hundred. They advanced to the entrance of the hall. At the sight of the bayonets the deputies set up tremendous shouts, as they had done at the appearance of Bonaparte. But these shouts were drowned by the rolling of the drums. "Grenadiers, forward!" cried the officers. The grenadiers entered the hall and dispersed the deputies, who fled, some by the passages, others by the windows. In a moment the hall was cleared and Bonaparte was left master of this deplorable field of battle.—Thiers's French Revolution, volume 4, page 428.

There, Mr. President, are brought before us in the faithful light of history the three most remarkable instances of military usurpation in the invasion of the rights and powers and the seizure of the persons of a legislature. Is it necessary to remind you that each of these scenes was followed by dark years of blood and sorrows, of convulsions that overturned the foundations of government, of despotisms that overshadowed the liberties of nations? They with the history of their calamities have been handed down to us as warning examples, and they stand as beacon-lights to direct us from their dangers. I trust that the American people will study these eminent lessons, and, contemplating the mighty disasters of which they were the sign or the origin, will command their representatives to rebuke their repetition and to anticipate the recurrence of their influence in this Republic.

Nor, will the defenders and apologists of the military usurpation in Louisiana derive much comfort or support from the examples to which they have referred in our own country. While altogether different in most important circumstances, and certainly in their constitutional character and relations not parallel to the event in Louisiana; yet, in the unhappy occurrences that succeeded them neither the dispersion of the territorial Legislature at Topeka nor the suppression of the State Legislature at Annapolis will be pleasant or safe authorities for our guidance. They too are conspicuous examples against the evils that certainly flow from military interference with civil authority even when exercised with the greatest caution and under the sternest necessity.

No, sir; military interventions with legislative assemblies have always been fruitful fountains of blood.

By the side of these examples in what light will the spectacle of the 4th of January at New Orleans appear? In what colors will some future Hume or Hallam draw the picture of that State-house surrounded with its cordon of polished steel; those brave batteries of artillery posted in the streets of the capital of Louisiana; those dark armaments frowning from the great Mississippi; those squadrons of armed troops stationed with their unfurled standards up and down the mournful city; that legislative hall, as the officer of the Army, with his buckled sword, and his file of soldiers, enter and seize the devoted five, and with fixed bayonets bear them from the capitol? Will it be recorded along with the event which occurred near that city sixty years ago as one of the great victories of liberty, or will it descend to other times as one of the dark and melancholy examples that begin a nation's downfall?

The history of Louisiana for the last few years presents an instructive but melancholy picture. We behold that once proud State occupying the most eligible position on the continent for the enjoyment of every element of material prosperity, and we should naturally expect to find in her rapidly reviving fortunes the promise of a greater future for the South. Her soil is as fruitful as a garden. Her climate, tempered between the glow of the tropics and the milder winds from the Gulf, is genial and delightful. Her productions are more abundant than those of the Nile. Her fruits are more delicious than those of Italy. Her flowers as fragrant and as beautiful as imagination can paint. The great Mississippi, once laden with the richest commerce of the world, flows through her borders. The Gulf of Mexico, like another Mediterranean, opens its broad bosom to her trade. Nature has blessed her with its most munificent gifts, and art has contributed to cultivate them to usefulness and beauty.

The people of Louisiana are a bright, brave, patriotic race, "unsurpassed among the nations of the earth in courage, spirit, generosity, and hospitality, and have that love and habit of truth which becomes brave men." They combine the refinement, the courtesy, the grace of the knightly Norman with the sterner and sturdier virtues of sterling English character; for in their veins are doubly united both streams of these noble bloods. Such is the physical State of Louisiana, and such is the character of the people who once possessed, but, in the language of the House committee, "do not now hold, the State government." From the union of such a country and such a people what of happiness and honor might we not naturally expect? And yet, Senators, you behold in Louisiana a scene of calamity which defies description. In all Europe, Asia, and America you will see no country, no people so cursed and so forlorn. For two hundred years in the receded past her history is without a parallel in mingled infamy and sorrow. There was genius and romantic devotion on the darkest page of the French revolution. Over the corruption and ruin in Louisiana there falls not a gleam of truth or intelligence. We travel through deserted and wasted districts only to contemplate the evidence of decay and to witness the symptoms of approaching dissolution. The sight of a once great, generous, gifted people sinking suddenly into irretrievable degeneracy and degradation, with no hope of deliverance, has rarely, if ever, occurred in the history of nations.

In that magnificent art gallery which one of the noblest benefactors and philanthropists of the age has presented to the people of this city to delight their tastes and elevate their sentiments there is a painting that represents the "Famine in Egypt." Whenever I enter that beautiful hall and behold on the sad canvas the shrunken forms and wasted faces and appealing eyes of that stricken people as they gaze on the tender and pitiful figures of their starving children and press the wilting bodies to their unnourishing breasts, my heart turns to Louisiana, and by the agony and ruin of that once noble State and the dark river that lays before her the painted death and despair on the Nile seems but a miniature. Sir, physical suffering is much; want, hunger, disease, pain, all try the mind and body; but what are they when a proud, refined, intelligent, Christian people behold the government, the liberty, the virtue their fathers left them, and which they in their souls cherish, dying out and passing away, never to return to them or their children—when they behold the shadows of Mexico, of Jamaica, of Central America, worse than the shadows of death, gradually but surely settling over their country?

Sir, when I have read of Palmyra and Balbec and Memphis and Thebes and the great empires and cities of remote ages, and have been told that no vestige of their existence remains and that the traveler looks in vain for the sites where they stood, I have often doubted their reality, for I could not understand how so many monuments of art and time could entirely perish; but in the rapid decline and transformation of Louisiana I see the truth of history vindicated. There can be a government so bad to which nothing of ruin is impossible, as there can be a government so good to which nothing of beneficence is impossible. But much as I deplore this gloomy picture, it is not entirely without some compensation. Had a State government established by the corruption of the Federal judiciary and sustained by the military power of the General Government been even tolerable, had it not been utterly and absolutely self-destructive, the American people might not have been awakened to its enormity, and the evil might have grown until it was too large and too deep to conquer and to eradicate. The melancholy and lamentable example is now before us in all its disastrous consequences, and I believe the country will administer a remedy. At least the usurped State government cannot stand. It is dying from its own corruption so fast that bayonets cannot support and give it life. Springing from no popular will, surrounded by no popular affections, restrained by no moral sense, directed by no enlightened patriotism, it is obliged to fall crushed by the weight of its own abuses, and universal contempt and detestation await its downfall.

Let us be more than thankful that usurpation cannot take root in the soil, cannot flourish in the pure air of the Republic. Beneath the withering shadow of its bayonets the prosperity and freedom of half a million people have sickened and fallen to the earth, and its depressing influences have extended far beyond the limits of a State and are felt in every limb and artery of the Republic. The commerce of a nation lifts its hands against the wrong; the manufactures of a country protest against the impolicy; all the trade of the States condemns the folly; all the industries of the Republic resist the injustice; all the humanities of the people rebuke the oppressions that have depressed, paralyzed, and exhausted their best resources and cast a frightful cloud upon their hopes. Every interest in the Union sympathizes with the misfortunes of Louisiana. The blow that struck her down has staggered the energies of the North and the East. Her blight and the adversities of her southern sisters have extinguished the fires in your furnaces, closed the doors of your mercantile palaces, left your ships to decay in the docks, stopped the music of your looms, and have taken their daily bread from the mouths of the noble sons of labor who support your wealth, prosperity, and glory.

When the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] declared a year since in clear words that "justice to the South was self-protection to the North," he uttered a great truth, one full of wisdom and full of patriotism. Time has verified his statesmanship. Justice is the safety of the nation. It is the only law of perpetual life, the only principle of permanent possession, and whenever or wherever it is violated, the sooner and the more palpable its retributions come the better will it be for the country. That relation which makes the prosperity of each section depend upon the prosperity of the other sections of the Union is the guarantee of its justice and the indissoluble bond of its integrity; and every American patriot must rejoice when he beholds a conspicuous illustration of the sublime principle. It is the union of duty, of interest, of self-preservation that binds together more firmly than laws, the union of the States, and the people. The destruction of material prosperity in the South has been followed, as the night follows the day, by the derangement, depression, and distress of all interests at the North; and the injury to constitutional liberty committed on the State of Louisiana may not as promptly but will as surely extend its dangerous influences over the free institutions of the country. An organ, a limb, one of the senses of the human frame, can no more be cut off or maimed without impairing the vital strength of the whole system than can a section or State of this Union be mutilated, stricken down, or dishonored without weakening, corrupting, degrading the power and character of the whole Republic? Sir, let this Union, with its harmonies unbroken by injustice, mad hate, and jarring discords, be a great and continuing circle of beneficence, diffusing its influence as the light comes from the firmament over our heads, and let its protection, its benefits, and honors descend equally upon all parts of the country as the dews from heaven; and it will stand as bright and as grand as the stars.

Let it not be thought that I have exaggerated the wrongs and misfortunes of the people of Louisiana. I refer to these extracts from the report of the House committee, and of Colonel Morrow, of the United States Army:

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislature, abolishing existing courts and judges and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws, centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia subject to the command of the governor; by the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, water-works, and ferries, cleaning vaults and removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with elective judges, and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks, issued during the years 1870 and 1872; by laws declaring that no persons in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have served to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials; a want of confidence equally in their purposes, and in their personnel; which is accompanied by the paralyzation of business and destruction of values. The most hopeful witness produced by the Kellogg party, while he declared that business was in a sounder condition than ever before, because there was less credit, has since declared that "there was no prosperity." The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40, while the fall in bank shares, railway shares, city and other corporate companies, have in a degree corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes, reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support, and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very evil, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, had come to filching and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry so generally—as Bishop Wilmarth stated without contradiction from any source—that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people, while within the parishes, as well as in New Orleans, the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission for the amount assessed, and houses and stores are to be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on the property. In many parishes all the white republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln; there are seven of the Boults in office in Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish, as they grew poor while officials grew rich, they became naturally sore. That they love their rulers cannot be pretended.—Report of the select committee composed of Messrs. Foster, Phelps, and Potter.

I now come to the general condition of affairs in the parishes on Red River, and, without the slightest exaggeration, I may say it is bad. Respect and regard for the General Government are expressed by all classes of people, and so is the determination not to be, under any circumstances, brought into collision with the Federal troops; but there is a universal expression of contempt for the State government, and, so far as language could express it, there is open defiance of its authority. The governor is everywhere, and by almost every white man, denounced a "usurper," and the determination is openly expressed by nearly every white man not to submit to his usurpation longer than submission is compelled by the presence and force of Federal soldiers.

Dissatisfaction and discontent are plainly visible in all the acts and conversation of the people, and the result is manifest in almost every department of business. Uncultivated fields, unrepaired fences, roofless and dilapidated dwellings, and abandoned houses meet the eye at every step, and the whole aspect of the country has a look of poverty and neglect. The schools in many parishes are closed for want of money to pay the teachers, and I was told again and again that the school funds had been stolen by the State officials. In one parish a criminal court had not been held in nearly two years, and in other parishes no court, criminal or civil, had been held for a long time. In a community where there are no courts crime finds a genial soil, and the natural result is that the law has fallen into disregard and disrepute. Judges were openly charged with corruption, and money, and not justice, is charged with turning the judicial scales.

The people reported, and seem to believe, that the machinery of the Federal courts had been used to oppress them for political ends, and that the Federal troops had been used for political purposes. How far this has been the case I have no means of knowing, but I do believe that deputy United States marshals have used United States soldiers in cases where there was no necessity for them, and, from my investigations, in the parishes of Ouachita and Lincoln, I am quite certain that these civil officers discharged their duties in an unnecessarily harsh, if not cruel, manner. It was represented to me that the marshals are in the habit of prowling through the country in the night-time, accompanied by a posse of soldiers, to make arrests of citizens who could be arrested by the marshal unaided, and, under any circumstances, should be arrested in the open daylight.

These night arrests seemed to have a peculiar terror for the people, and my attention was repeatedly called to them. Another subject of complaint was the fact that citizens are arrested without the shadow of a cause, and after long and vexatious delay and great expense, are set at liberty without affording them even a preliminary hearing.—Letter of Henry A. Morrow, lieutenant-colonel Thirteenth Infantry, United States Army.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Saint Louis, Missouri, January 4, 1875.

This paper is most respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War with a request that he submit it for the personal perusal of the President. I know of no officer of Colonel Morrow's rank who is better qualified to speak and write of matters like this, and his opinions are entitled to great consideration. I profess to have some knowledge of the people of that section, both white and black, from a long residence among them before the war and several visits since, but I shall not intrude my opinion in the confusion in which the subject is now enveloped.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

How, Mr. President, let me ask you, is this Union to be maintained and preserved? In the Southern States there are eight millions of white people who entertain political sentiments of great unanimity. I know you can govern this people by force for a time. You have the physical power to do it; you have already done it. Russia governs the whole of her immense territory by this system. It is a simple form of government; unlimited and irresponsible power on one side and passive obedience and blind submission on the other—the despot and the serf. Senators, I know you do not intend to erect here on the ashes of American liberty an iron throne and place on it an emperor with the imperial purple of the Cæsars or the ice-bound diadem of the Russias. From the very thought you shrink back in horror, with indignant incredulity. You love the institutions of our fathers and you love the Union and can proudly point to the sacrifices you have made to hold and bind it together. But let me ask you, if you think it possible to govern one-half of this country by despotic force and administer free government for the people of the other half? Can one-half of this country be free and the other half enslaved? Can fifteen States of this Union be stricken down; their liberties conquered; their laws overthrown; their free government subverted; their spirits, their hopes, their aspirations crushed to the earth; their industries paralyzed, and their prosperity prostrated, and the other twenty-two States under the same General Government enjoy their free and popular institutions, move in their regular orbits of State powers and duties, advance in material wealth and physical development, and maintain all their domestic laws and rights without disorder, confusion, and ultimate ruin? History has furnished no such example of a government, one half free and the other half enslaved. The imagination of Milton in his great sorrow, with the holy light of heaven shut out forever from his eyes, has drawn that picture in the "portress of hell-gates." There we behold the head, breast, and arms of a lovely woman, fair as Liberty herself; but below the waist are seen in loathsome contrast the hideous forms of beasts, of serpents, of satyrs, and of demons, the horrid types of despotism and slavery. That picture was justly drawn by the patriot poet in "Paradise Lost;" and when it shall displace the pure and beautiful image of American liberty, always rightly presented to our eyes as a virgin in the loveliest form of attraction to the hearts of men, it will be in the land of "liberty lost."

No, this Government cannot last if this is to be its character. It is an impossibility. The Southern States must be free and independent, or the Northern States will soon be enslaved and degraded with their southern sisters. A government that exercises tyranny, that practices oppression, that enslaves whole communities, must lose its love of liberty—must become indifferent to the forms and principles of popular freedom, and will soon overthrow and destroy not only the forms but the substance of liberty itself. This must be true. Every violation of the rights of the South, every sacrifice of our constitutional guarantees, every disruption of the principles of good government, every unlawful precedent, every example of violence, each instance of indifference to constitutional duty exhibited to us is a blow, a thrust, it may be a deadly wound to popular government itself.

The Constitution which protects and defends and regulates American liberty cannot be stabbed, wounded, prostrated in Louisiana; cannot be violated, prostituted, abused in Mississippi; cannot be awed, terrified, intimidated in Arkansas; cannot be menaced, threatened, imperiled in North Carolina and Georgia, and survive and live in health and vigor to shield and bless New York and Ohio. Every blow inflicted on the fundamental charter of American liberty weakens all its just powers and tends to reduce it to the contempt of mankind. The pure form and spirit of constitutional liberty once, twice, thrice violated, must lose the power of virtue, the beauty of chastity, and either become the Venus of despotism, or like the model of Roman virtue, perish with its dishonor. Nor would the sacrifice of this noblest victim appease the passion for power.

Upon what line, let me ask you, will unconstitutional ambition pause? Do you think it will respect geographical boundaries or State limits? Do you suppose it will halt on the banks of the Potomac, or will it turn back from the waters of the Ohio? Senators, do not delude yourselves. If you do not desire, and I know you do not, that these noble rivers should be the Rubicons of some future Cæsar, do not follow the blind confidence of Pompey, when he boasted that he "could raise armies with the stamp of his foot" to crush the conqueror of Gaul; but rebuke, chasten, and while you have the strength forever put an end to that usurpation and abuse of power which, beginning in the South, may at some day march over the liberties of the North and erect upon the ruins of both another empire as brilliant and as grand as the one which Augustus founded, and as dark, as miserable, and as infamous as that which ended with the last of the Cæsars. Power, unlawful power, never has and never will stop in its career. It grows on what it feeds. Unbridle it, and, like the imprisoned winds let loose, it spreads; its force swells and gathers new strength, and nothing stays its march until all resistance and opposition are swept before it.

Do not deceive yourselves. You cannot confine within the limits of prostrate and trampled Louisiana the spirit or the operation of unconstitutional usurpation. That once fair State will not be, unless you make it so, the grave of unauthorized power—Heaven forbid that it should be the grave of the Constitution. I think we can already see the bared arms of military ascendency stretching out for further conquest and seizing the shrinking forms of two neighboring States. Shall that power put its feet upon their necks and trample in the dust what is left of their liberties? It is not in the nature of unlawful power to regulate itself; an excess, a wrong, a usurpation itself, it has no capacity to limit or check its own abuse. It can only exist by advancing; it dares not pause in moderation; the very necessities of its own being, the very laws of its life inexorably drive it to the extremest limits of possible conquest. The violation of one law compels the violation of another, the overthrow of one principle anticipates the overthrow of another, the subversion of one guarantee makes the subversion of another guarantee necessary to sustain the first breach, and usurpation cannot and dare not pause, cannot hesitate until every barrier, obstacle, impediment to its success is demolished and removed. It trembles for its existence while any of the citadels of liberty or law remain unsubdued. They stand as a constant menace and peril to its permanence. No sooner does the gracious Duncan sleep well in his grave than the mind of Macbeth is full of scorpions, for "Banquo and his Fleance live," and soon all causes give way to his own good and he is

> In blood
> Stept in so far, that, should he wade no more,
> Returning were as tedious as go o'er.

It was the inexorable destiny of usurped power which never permitted the First Napoleon to repose upon his victories. That destiny drove him to Egypt, drove him to Russia, drove him to Waterloo, and drove him to his ruin; and had it not terminated in his overthrow his usurped power could have been consummated in nothing but the subversion of all established government and liberty in Europe.

Laws are silent under the thunders of artillery; in the blaze of bayonets their lights are eclipsed and amid clashing sabers their forms perish. Before the tread and tramp of armed legions their unshielded ministers are powerless. Let it never be forgotten that the sword is the mortal enemy of liberty, the argument that tyrants throw into the scales of justice. But unhappily for mankind there is something in the splendor of military display that captivates the human heart. The sword has its fatal charms. "The pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," the caparisoned steed, the gorgeous pavilion, the mounted warrior, the stir of martial music dazzle and blind men to the wrongs of which they are the instruments. Admiration and gratitude for distinguished military service are just and noble sentiments, honoring no less those who receive than those who render them, when exercised with respect for the laws of the country and the rights of the people. But these sentiments become crimes when they obscure the love of liberty or defend the abuses of power. Let us beware of the fascinations of the sword; familiarity with it is certain contempt for law. The two cannot embrace, and all history warns us which falls.

Mr. President, the American people are not exempt from the imperfections of men, and we shall quickly advance headlong to the downfall of our liberties unless we consider the warning lessons of those who have gone before us. We have been repeatedly told in this debate that in republican America there is no danger to be feared from military ascendency. The eloquent Senator from New Jersey with patriotic ardor asked, What would become of our little Army of thirty thousand men before the indignant rebuke of millions of freemen? Has the learned Senator forgotten that Cæsar did not have thirty thousand men when he left Gaul and overthrew the liberty of six hundred years? Sir, far be it from me to intimate that there are any among us who would willfully destroy the institutions of their country. I cast no suspicions, for I have none, upon the patriotism of my countrymen. They no doubt desire as ardently as I do that this beneficent Government should be perpetuated in all its usefulness and glory to distant ages.

But, Senators, the Constitution intrusts to us in perhaps the highest degree the guardianship of its rights, and we should deserve universal execration if we were not faithful to the duty. Sir, I would be unwilling to trust myself with the liberties of my country. When statesmen do not fear to commit these liberties to the hands of any man I tremble for American freedom, for its sentinels will sleep with fatal security. Human wisdom and human virtue are neither perfect, and we must provide against the errors of both. The liberties which a dictator preserves have already lost their virtue. Liberty protected by despotism is but a name; despotism is the government. I, sir, am afraid, ever afraid of military ascendency. Every lesson of history commands me to fear it. What is the history of all republics? In some necessity of the state the civil supremacy gives way to the military power. This becomes the habit of government, until some chieftain, popular with the army and with the people, succeeds in making both his slaves.

This is the history of the world. It is the story of the downfall of liberty everywhere. Cæsar's three hundred victories paved his road to the Roman Empire; Napoleon's triumphs as general of the army and first consul prepared his way to the crown of France; but for his moderation and virtue and supreme patriotism the services and successes of Washington would have made him sovereign of the American people. The picture in the Rotunda that represents the popular general of the army in the act of surrendering his sword to the Congress of his country should not perpetuate the immortal deed on canvas alone, but should imprint it in light that will live forever in the hearts of the people. That great sword was never so bright as when sheathed and surrendered to the majesty of law. But few, few have been the swords that have shone with that moral glory. That best picture of Washington should be placed where those who are expected to follow his illustrious example should daily behold its grandeur and be inspired by its patriotism and virtue.

And as the examples of Washington are never without instruction and benefit, it will be well to contemplate his prudent steps in the discharge of that most delicate duty—the suppression of an insurrection in a State by the National Government. In Marshall's Life of Washington, giving an account of the insurrection in Pennsylvania in 1794, we find this passage:

> While the necessary steps were taking to bring this force into the field, a last essay was made to render its employment unnecessary. The Attorney-General, who was a citizen of Pennsylvania; Judge Gates, of the superior court; and Mr. Ross, a Senator representing that State, who was particularly popular in the western country, were deputed by the Government to be the bearers of a general amnesty for past offenses, on the sole condition of future obedience to the laws.
> It having been deemed advisable that the executive of the State in which the insurrection had taken place should act in concert with that of the United States, a proclamation was also issued by Governor Mifflin, and commissioners were appointed by him to unite with those of the General Government.

And a few pages further we are told that the "President issued a second proclamation," and then we see that—

> The President, in person, visited each division of the Army; but being confident that the force employed must look down all resistance, he left the Secretary of the Treasury to accompany it, and returned himself to Philadelphia, at which place the approaching session of Congress rendered his presence almost indispensably necessary.

And we learn also that—

> On the 19th the President met both Houses in the Senate Chamber, in order to make, personally, those communications which the state of the nation required.
> As many would read the speech who might not peruse the documents which had been published for the purpose of unfolding the conduct of Government to the insurgents, the President thought proper to detail at considerable length the progress of opposition to the laws, the means employed both by the Legislature and Executive to appease the discontents which had been fomented, and the measures which he had finally taken to reduce the refractory to submission.—Marshall's Life of Washington, volume 5, pages 584, 589, 595.

In the letter of instruction from Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury under Washington, to General Lee, then commanding the Army to suppress the insurrection, dated October 20, 1794, occurs this passage:

> You are to exert yourself by all possible means to preserve discipline among the troops, particularly a scrupulous regard to the rights of persons and property and a respect for the authority of the civil magistrate; taking especial care to inculcate and cause to be observed this principle: that the duties of the Army are confined to the attacking and subduing of armed opponents of the laws, and to the supporting and aiding of the civil officers in the execution of their functions.

And in Washington's own letter of the same date, written to General Lee, we find this paragraph:

> There is but one other point on which I think it proper to add a special recommendation; it is, that every officer and soldier will constantly bear in mind that he comes to support the laws, and that it would be peculiarly unbecoming in him to be in any way the infractor of them; that the essential principles of a free government confine the province of the military, when called forth on such occasions, to these two objects: first, to combat and subdue all who may be found in arms in opposition to the national will and authority; secondly, to aid and support the civil magistrates in bringing offenders to justice. The dispensation of this justice belongs to the civil magistrate; and let it ever be our pride and our glory to leave the sacred deposit there inviolate.—Sparks's Writings of Washington, volume 10, pages 447, 448.

And in his letter to Alexander Hamilton, of October 31, 1794, from Philadelphia, he says:

> Press the governors to be pointed in ordering the officers under their respective commands to march back with their respective corps; and to see that the inhabitants meet with no disgraceful insults or injuries from them.—Sparks's Writings of Washington, volume 10, page 450.

Thus, we see the prudence, the care, the anxiety, the patriotism with which Washington proceeded in suppressing the first insurrection that broke out after the formation of our Government. He issues a first and then a second proclamation. He sends a commission of three distinguished citizens of the country, one his Attorney-General, and all popular and influential gentlemen with the insurgents, to confer with them and offer full amnesty. He influences the governor of Pennsylvania to appoint a similar commission for the same purpose. He visits the divisions of the Army in person "to obtain more correct information." "He leaves his Secretary of the Treasury with the Army in his absence." He meets both Houses of Congress and "thinks proper to detail to them at considerable length" the fullest advice of his conduct. He publishes his address for the information of the country, and "he takes special care to inculcate and causes to be observed this principle," "the military is always to be subordinate to the civil authority," and that "the soldiers are never to insult or injure the people."

Such are the lessons of Washington, widely different from those of Cæsar, Cromwell, and Napoleon. In these lessons we shall look in vain for precedents for the recent conduct of our Army in Louisiana. I trust that these wise, prudent, patriotic, successful examples of the Father-President of the Republic may always commend themselves to the admiration and imitation of his successors. I hold them up to-day as lights for the encouragement and guidance of his countrymen. Senators, let us at least be inspired by their patriotism and directed by their wisdom.

The time will come, when the excitements of this heated hour are gone, that the country will thank the South for the exhibition of that virtue which saved the Southern States from the fate of Mexico and Jamaica. You are not now in a temper to appreciate this fact, but time, the great arbiter, will do justice, and for that judgment we must wait. History will write it down that your policy if accomplished would have turned the Southern States over into the hands of the newly emancipated blacks and the desperate and corrupt men who united with them. It will record the fact that this party under the reconstruction acts obtained possession and control of most of the Southern States, and established over them a government of supreme and startling wickedness, exceeding in corruption and licentiousness the darkest drama of the Middle Ages. It will paint with the pen of Gibbon or Macaulay for the instruction of future ages that black picture of fraud and infamy from which I shall not this day lift the veil, which came like a plague over the prostrate and bound South. It will tell of the ruin, the waste, and the despair. It will then draw the faint lines of hope and courage, and show the great heart of our people rising in its might to break the power that crushed it. Sir, the struggle was long and desperate—often doubtful; the cause of good government often trembled in the balance, and many times it seemed that the light would go out and nothing but darkness and dismay be left on the face of our country. It was not due to the General Government that the Southern States did not succumb in this crisis, for the authority of the Government was arrayed on the side of those who were destroying the South. It was not due to the reconstruction acts, for they proscribed and disabled the best men of the South. It was not due to the republican party, for it supported and sustained the despoilers of our substance and liberties.

To what cause is due the deliverance of the South from that misrule which in two short years wrought more ruin than the war? It is due solely, but proudly and justly due to the courage, the faith, the prudence, the watchfulness, and the unwavering devotion of the southern people to the ever-living principles of constitutional government. To these great qualities of our people we are this day indebted that eight millions of people are not in revolution, in anarchy, in chaos, in a living death of misery and shame. There is no grander achievement than the rescue of the Southern States by her own people from the mortal dangers that environed them. Our forefathers met no such odds during or after the Revolution. The English people from whom we are descended at no time encountered such complicated evils and no people ever displayed nobler qualities than the people of the South in this the gloomiest period of her history. Was their forbearance ever equaled? When before was a proud, warlike race subjected to the domination of their recent slaves? Has their courage been surpassed? What other people disarmed, despoiled, surrounded by armies, and exhausted by disastrous war would not have surrendered principle? Has their patriotism been exceeded? When before did a people lose so much property, suffer so many disappointments, bear so many vicissitudes, and keep faith to their country? Has their virtue ever been eclipsed? Neither threats, nor blandishments, nor promises, nor preferments, nor fears, nor hopes have for one moment seduced them from fidelity to their convictions of duty.

Senators, at any time in the last ten years, if the people of the South could have embraced the republican party, they might have basked in the smiles of the Administration and silenced every accusation against them. They thought they saw the tendency of that party was to their degradation and the ruin of their country, and they could not unite with it. Is it a just cause of offense that they did not purchase place and amnesty at the sacrifice of what they believed right? Let us suppose for one moment that instead of resisting the republican party at the South the white people of the South had joined the negroes, the adventurers, and the corrupt and misguided natives who seized the State governments after reconstruction and united in that desperate and reckless movement against all public virtue and private respect. Let me ask what would be the condition now of the Southern States? Human imagination can conceive nothing so horrible. United with undivided energy and resolution against them, we barely saved the vestiges of government and the fragments of property from demoralization and rapacity? Had we presented no check, no obstacle to their schemes, but fallen in with their policy, how unutterably deplorable would have been the result?

Who has saved the country from those accursed consequences? Who has been the great conservative health element of the South? Who has rebuked public spoliation? Who has exposed enormous public crime? Who has checked extravagant public expenditure? Who has resisted general corruption? Who has stood faithfully by constitutional government? Who has maintained public morality and social order? Who has driven from the country the authors of high state crimes, and who has brought to light and exposed to the civilized world for just indignation and punishment the usurpations, the tyrannies, the rampant violations of all law that have been committed in the South? And yet we are denounced as great criminals, sympathizers with murder, accomplices of assassins, organizers of horrid crime to accomplish political success. Yes, sir; the time will come when the country will do justice to our motives and our conduct, and the true character and cause of our people will appear as bright as the day.

Mr. President, is this hostility between the sections never to cease? Is the temple of Janus never to be closed? Will not a war which cost so much precious blood, so much dear-bought treasure, suffice for this insatiate passion? Have we not had suffering enough? What other sacrifice is necessary to appease this mad demon, this gory Moloch of hate? Are more priceless offerings yet to be burned on his altars before peace will come? Will nothing appease this destructive god of discord but the ruin, the overthrow of free government, and the perpetual misery and strife of this great people? Is this war, this feud, to last between the sections forever? Is there nothing that will stop its fury, nothing that will quell its flames, nothing that will allay the wild winds that fan its fires? It has not been quenched in blood, it has not been exhausted in desolation; the distress, agony, and sorrow of eight millions of people have not softened its angry spirit; ten years of bitter anguish have but exasperated its malignant heat. It is here to-day in unabated fierceness, spreading dismay and baleful shadows over all the land. Is there no exorcism for this hateful fiend of dissension? No calm, quiet spirit to walk on the bitter waters of sectional strife and bid them be still?

Senators, the highest and holiest motives that ever inspired the breasts of mortals should impel us here on this floor to compose this question forever and give peace and repose to the entire country. The South demands it to secure and restore her wasted fortunes, and to educate her people, and to give them comfort and material life. The North requires it that she may have a market for her products and a great support in all times of distress from whatever cause or quarter it may come. Both need it for their mutual safety, happiness, honor, and existence. It is our duty to settle this disturbing and harassing difference. We cannot escape it; we cannot leave it to time; we cannot trifle and palter with it. It involves the life of the nation, the happiness of millions, the fate of free government on the earth. If we are not equal to the great event, if we have not the ability and patriotism to discharge it, if we are not able to accomplish this the first object of our office, let us at least have the manly courage to acknowledge our weakness and bravely surrender our places to those who are superior to our infirmities, and who can and will march up to the line of this high duty and wisely and nobly perform it. We can at least do that; and if we can render no other or better service to our country, we ought certainly to be men and give way to those who can.

The great father of our country, in his farewell address, the last words he spoke to the nation, warned us against these sectional lines and divisions. We did not heed that paternal warning. Disobedience to it brought us innumerable woes, and there is but one road back to a condition of peace, prosperity, and liberty. That road was marked out by the founders of the Republic, and unless it be faithfully followed, we will wander off into a wild career of uncertainty and tumult, ending finally, where all the other free governments have ended, in despotism. Remember the civil wars of the Grecian republics were soon followed by the Roman, along the same road, from freedom. The wars between Athens and Sparta, between Sparta and Bœotia, between first two and finally all the free states of Attica, left Greece an easy victim for Philip. Their dissensions, their wars, their factions broke down the spirit of liberty, and the Greeks who, when united, made Thermopylæ, Salamis, and Platea immortal, succumbed, when divided, to Macedon almost without a struggle, and forever obliterated their greatness and their liberties. Heaven forbid that we should repeat their melancholy examples.

Mr. President, are we to revive here the strifes of the unhappy years that preceded the war? Are these noble Halls, dedicated to human liberty, to become arenas for the exhibition of mad passions? Is the genius, the courage, the resistless energy of this wonderful people to be perverted and wasted here in angry controversy, in mutual crimination and recrimination, in wicked, blind efforts to pull down and destroy the great sections of the Union? Are all the powers of our minds and the forces of our hearts to be forever enlisted in the execrable attempt to destroy and degrade the character of sister States? Is discord to reign here forever? Senators, the terrible calamities of such a course cannot be doubted. I will not even dare to foresee or predict them. I will simply say how much nobler, grander, wiser would we be if we would unite all our faculties, our hopes, our purposes, our aims, our efforts in the work of pacifying all our conflicts, reforming our errors, improving our institutions, and giving strength, stability, beauty, and beneficence to our Government.

Have we no objects to engage our talents or excite our aspirations but hostile assaults and counter assaults upon our own people? Are there no other aims or hopes to government? Are these the grand purposes written on the face of the Constitution for which the Government was established? Is this the way to "form a more perfect Union"? Is this the way "to provide for the common defense?" Is this the way "to insure domestic tranquillity?" Is this the way "to promote the general welfare?" Is this the way "to transmit the blessings of liberty to our children?" Sir, a continent, embraced by the great oceans of commerce and extending through all the degrees of latitude, and receiving as its own the children of all the world, is ours, ours to enjoy, to improve, to enlighten, to beautify, and to bless. Strife, feuds, hates will do none of these good works. Devote one-half the earnest passion, the excited intellect, the ardent exertion to reconcile, restore, benefit, and advance the country that is madly and wickedly spent in attempts to array one portion against the other, to oppress one portion to aggrandize the other, to traduce one portion to exalt the other, and we shall build up here in this western world an example of human wisdom and virtue far surpassing any vision of splendor and happiness that human imagination has yet conceived.

Mr. President, what is the temper and spirit of the southern people at this time? You would doubtless like to learn it exactly from one who has the opportunity of knowing it, who has the authority to represent it, and who can also speak it from his own bosom. I know no better way of describing it than by saying that there are two illustrious characters in Roman history who for two thousand years have divided the admiration of mankind, and whose names have become the synonyms of patriotic sacrifice. The first is Quintus Curtius, mounted on his brave horse and in the presence of the Roman people riding calmly into the yawning gulf in the forum to save his country; the second is Marcus Brutus, standing in the capitol with the dagger with which he stabbed Cæsar and with which he was ready to stab himself—both among the greatest examples of devotion to country. Mr. President, were I to express the patriotic sentiment of the South at this hour, I would simply say that there are thousands in the South who would follow the example of Curtius and willingly walk into the threatening gulf, if the sacrifice will close its deepening abyss and give peace and liberty to the country, and there is not one who is mad enough to play the role of Brutus. We have lost none of our love of liberty, none of our independent spirit, none of our attachment to our country, none of our admiration for the sublime virtue of the "last of the Romans;" but we consider that peace is a necessity with us, and we hope that a returning sense of justice at the North will unite with us in preserving liberty, law, and constitutional government.

We have not yet despaired of the influences of reason, truth, equity, right, and interest in the opinion of the great but often mistaken North. We have learned that patriots have a higher duty to perform than to follow the example of Cato at Utica. It is sometimes nobler to live and suffer for your country than it is to die for it. The patriotism of Curtius saved the seven-hilled city; the patriotism of Brutus precipitated the downfall of Roman liberty. Preserving then the fires of liberty in our hearts as sacredly and devotedly as the vestal virgins kept them burning on their ever-blazing altars, and relying upon the ultimate patriotism of the North, we are resolved with heroic patience to stand around and guard the temples of the nation's peace and to manifest in its defense and preservation, if possible, a higher and holier and firmer devotion and fortitude than our brave men displayed on the battle-field. We are now in the lines, in the intrenchments, in the bulwarks of the peace, harmony, prosperity, and union of this great people and country; and fanaticism, sectional hatred, unjust animosities and prejudices and passions cannot prevail against us. No, sir, we shall be successful. Already I see the snows of the great North dissolving and soon to flow in warm and genial streams to the bosom of the South; already I see its great systems of industry awakening and beholding in the ruin of the South the certain destruction of their own prosperity; already I discern its great heart beginning to warm under the influence of gentle light from the South and to open its deepest and broadest sympathies for our sufferings and our wrongs. Already from the "clear upper sky," where the serene spirits of the great founders of American liberty and government shine, come pouring down upon us streams of fervent and radiant light, rekindling in our hearts the fires of patriotism and duty and mutual forbearance that animated their great souls.

From the summit of Bunker Hill the voice of American history and patriotism spoke to the heart of Mr. Sumner, the great apostle of emancipation, and commanded him to remember the devotion and sacrifices of the South in the "times that tried men's souls," and he could not sleep under the shadows of that eloquent stone until he had made an effort to extinguish the hostile memories of war. From every battle of the Revolution arise the shades of immortal martyrs and command us to end this strife. From the bloody and honorable fields on the northern lakes, around this capital and from the plains of New Orleans, from the gallant decks of the proud Navy that proclaimed that the universal seas should be free and from the yet fresh victories in Mexico, from all comes an appeal for peace. Ah, Mr. President, does not the same appeal with more tender and touching pathos speak to us from Manassas, Fredericksburgh, Sharpsburgh, and Gettysburgh? The great spirits who fell there and passed from the shadows of earth amid the roar of artillery and the red blaze of war have long since made peace on the camping-grounds of the brave and the just; over the scenes of their last mortal combat the green grass and the sweet flowers of nature have returned with the beautiful spring, and from their united ranks on that august field of review before which all human actions must pass there descends to their countrymen the "white flag" of a final and unending truce, with the message that their blood has been sufficient atonement for the sins of the nation, and that over their peaceful graves their countrymen must shake hands and forever be friends.

Then, Senators, in the name of our great forefathers who for civil and religious liberty braved the ocean, the tempest, the forest, and the savage to rescue freedom from its fate in Europe and plant it in this new world; by the memory of those patriots who one hundred years ago gave their blood and treasure like water to establish our independence; by the names of those who have fallen on every field from Lexington to Appomattox, let us be friends, countrymen, brothers. I invoke the Senators of Massachusetts by the memory of North Carolina's succor in her darkest hour; I invoke the Senators from New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware by the memories of their united struggles with Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia; I invoke the Senators from every State—from the great daughters of Virginia and North Carolina, from those mighty Commonwealths that sprang from the Louisiana purchase by Jefferson and were saved by the valor and patriotism of southern men under Jackson—I invoke all this day and this hour to gather around the family altars and end forever and forever this fratricidal strife. And we shall rear upon the ruins of our errors and follies, over the prejudices, passions, and hates of the past a grander and nobler temple of wisdom, justice, and liberty than the sun has yet shone upon, and all over and through that temple from its foundation to its dome we shall behold arrayed side by side the virtues, the valor, the sacrifices, and the immortal achievements of the North and the South. And then as the sun rises in the east and makes his daily revolutions until he sinks to rest in the west his beams will spread the light of American liberty and the glory of a happy and united people over the whole earth as a blessing to all mankind.

And now, Senators, I conclude with the sentiments with which I began. I thank a merciful Providence that I have been spared to see this day and inspired with the courage and truth to vindicate the character of the South and make a faithful effort to restore and preserve the American Union. I thank God that, if I do nothing else, I can at least leave to my sons this record, that when they shall remember that the people of the South, animated by patriotic courage, undertook in obedience to the principles handed down to them by their fathers to separate the Union and arrayed themselves in arms to accomplish that end, and they shall see the name of their ancestors among those whose bright bayonets on the 12th day of July, 1864, reflected the beams of the morning sun back on the dome of the nation's Capitol, my children shall also behold the name of their father, when that sad war was over, enrolled in the same Capitol among those who were striving with unalterable and unchangeable devotion to cherish and perpetuate forever the Union of the States, the Constitution, and liberty. And may God bless me with the strength and patriotism to do so much for the peace, happiness, and honor of my country that no human being can doubt the sincerity of my attachment and love for her.

Senators, I cannot take my seat without expressing to you more than my deepest acknowledgments for the kindness with which you have this day heard me and for the sympathy and generosity which all of you have manifested for me since my admission to this Chamber. Extend that sympathy and generosity to the noble people of the South, and they will return to you the warm gratitude and friendship which I now feel, and hope to carry in my heart through life.

The Louisiana Law.

SPEECH OF HON. T. M. NORWOOD,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 17 and 26, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the resolution to admit P. B. S. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana—

Mr. NORWOOD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When the fox, weary from the chase, begins to trail his brush and hears the deep-mouthed bay of the pack and the shout of the hunters pressing hard upon him, his instinct teaches him to double on his track in order to elude the hot pursuit. When the politician finds himself pursued by an indignant people he, too, from instinct, turns in his path—endeavors to cover up his tracks and reach his point of departure. Sir John Falstaff was pregnant and quick with this high moral virtue. He was a model politician He knew the true prince from instinct. His modern lineal descendants reflect no shade of dishonor on the valorous instincts of their great progenitor.

There is a story told of an animal whose depredations upon the beasts of the forest continued and grew to be so outrageous that he was finally called to an account. That animal was Reynard, the fox. He had abused Bruin; he had abused Chanticleer; he had maltreated Isegrim, the wolf, and Gieremund his wife, and, indeed, every beast of the forest and field. At length complaints were laid before King Noble, the lion, and Reynard was accordingly arraigned before the King, but instead of confessing his crimes, or putting in a plea of not guilty, he appeared and began to confess the sins of the other beasts.

Mr. President, we have an illustration of the history of Reynard in the political party which has had control of this Government for the last ten years. Beyond the close of the war I do not propose to go, because that is holy ground. The republican party has gone on, step after step, leading first the whites and then the blacks into difficulties, but in every instance they have reaped the advantage. They have at length reached a point in their transgressions where the people of this country have issued their summons to bring the transgressors to an account. They have gone on with tentative measures to see how far they could test the spirit of the American people, until they have finally reached the point where, by the bayonet, a sovereign State has been overthrown. And when charged with the offense, they answer by retaliation, and by confessing the sins of the democratic party. The republican party had its origin in the institution of slavery; by slavery it grew and strengthened; and now it seeks to prolong existence by the carcass of slavery long after it has perished. Every struggle to maintain itself is fought over the grave of slavery. Like the wary fox, that party when hard pressed returns to the point of its origin.

During this discussion the Senate has been entertained, not to say charmed, by the sheet-iron thunder which has constituted the staple production of the Senator from Indiana for the last six years on every southern question. He has "split the ears of the groundlings" with measured and long-drawn agony. He has rung the changes in a gamut of two notes, which are murder and fraud, with their appropriate variations, consisting of assassination, killing, butchery, manslaughter, and infanticide, (which last was, no doubt, the attempt at killing Kellogg;) while the variations on frauds extend in grade from those which are pious to those committed by Kellogg, Packard, and Jacques. That honorable Senator will, I am sure, pardon me for telling the Senate, that the extent of his scale of subjects, the regularity of their succession, the dirge-like solemnity of their pitch, and their exceeding similarity at each reproduction, find a fitting parallel in the select repertory of classical pieces which were ground out alternately by the organ-grinder whose only tunes on a two days' engagement to furnish music for a dance were, "Old Dog Tray" and the "Mulligan Guards." I pray that Senator to vary the performance. It is too much like the bill of fare which was bacon and greens for breakfast, greens and bacon for dinner, and bacon and greens for supper. When the press reporters can say, "Senator MORTON spoke to-day on Louisiana, or Pinchback, or southern outrages; for a full report of which, see his speech delivered four years ago and twenty-one times since, verbatim," I feel apprehensive that he may lose his reputation for originality.

The honorable Senator may not be aware of what all others know, that his cry of murder has become monotonous and chronic, not to say "stale, flat, and unprofitable." The miller soon becomes a sound sleeper amidst the clatter of his mill. The residents on Broadway grow unconscious of the "rattle over the stony street," and even the cry of murder, when the audience know it is only a part of the play, loses its alarm. Whenever one of the opposition denounces the despotic treatment of Louisiana, we as naturally expect to hear the customary refrain and epilogue of murder and fraud, as to hear the doxology at the close of religious worship.

And yet I would not do the honorable Senator the injustice to say that he never varies this melancholy exercise, for there is one other object that divides his distinguished sorrow. For over two years he has carried almost alone a burden whose weight deterred all friends from lending him a sympathetic hand. During that period there has been a nondescript person flitting through this Capitol from one wing to the other, in rapid succession, claiming at one end of the building to be an embassador from a State, and at the other to be a Representative of the people. When he faces from the rotunda toward this Chamber, he is a Senator. When he faces toward the Representative Hall, he is a tribune of the people. When he is in Louisiana, he is a governor or a legislator. But he is one and all at one and the same time. He is to-day the most elected man on the face of the earth, and yet he cannot get an office. The Senator from Indiana, fully sympathizing with his melancholy condition, has exhausted all his wonderful resources in the vain endeavor to secure this dove of peace a resting-place, that he might be relieved of the labor and burden of carrying so many commissions. When the Senator has presented him here, he has been rejected. He would then face about and march with him to the House and present him there; but they, too, would not receive their own "man and brother." Whether the Senator has failed to get this valuable acquisition off his hands because he is suspected of dealing in a spurious article, or the article itself is supposed to contain too much alloy, no one can say. But the Senator evidently imagined at the date of this acquisition that he had "found a pearl of great price." I suspect, however, that he does not value it quite as much as he did two years ago. The demand has grown dull. The styles have somewhat changed; and public taste has changed likewise; and the Senator's commodity is nothing but the stock of two seasons past, and is out of date. But I must not be understood as reflecting on the character or standing of "the coming man," who for two years has burdened the Senator from Indiana as the "old man of the sea" rode the weary back of Sinbad the sailor. For I cannot withhold my admiration from a man who has upset our settled faith in the motto of Dick Swiveller, that "no obscure individual ever set himself up against fate and proved a success." A man who could organize a bigger fraud than Warmoth, Packard, and Casey, and overcome the brother-in-law of the President, backed by the whole strength of Executive patronage in a race for this Senate, must be one of prowess. I do not wonder that the Senator from Louisiana, dazzled by his genius and alarmed by the result of the last November election, should press for the potent aid which Pinchback could render on every call of the ayes and noes. It is a needful exhibition of that unselfish gratitude which is "but a lively sense of favors yet to come."

The charge of murder and frauds is made by the honorable Senator from Indiana against his former political friends. "This is the most unkindest cut of all." He ought to be generous enough to be silent, even though he may suppose, since his desertion of us, that we still possess any of the spirit of lawless men. But if he will not be generous, the least he should do is to assume, for the time, such a modicum of modesty as to permit the world to doubt, whether all the virtues and humanity of the democratic party departed from it in the hem of his garments, when he abandoned us to our fate.

But the Senator from Indiana stands not alone in his charge of cruelty and wrong against the Democratic party. The Senator from Illinois has also joined in the cry against his former associates with all the zeal of a recent convert. We had hoped that he would rest content with a proper exhibition of his pious devotion to his new allies, and of the miraculous saving grace by which he has been born again, and would have spared us the not unusual spectacle of young ambition kicking at the ladder by which it climbed to glory. But our hope was dashed, and we were dismayed when he joined in the tintinnabulation of the Senator from Indiana, by beating for two mortal days his accompaniment on a dry skull as his kettle-drum, with two dry bones for sticks. The symphony was most appropriate, but his music, if at all celestial, was only so because he adopted the mode of warfare of the ancient Chinese, who rushed on their enemy to frighten them by the clatter of resounding gongs. It yet remains to be determined whether in those two days' conflict he "overcame the Nervii" by the skillful and energetic rattling of those bones. The American people in the main are not of the nervous temperament, and were I to venture an opinion in advance of the day in 1876 when they shall pass judgment on this Administration, I would say that the Chinese mode of warfare adopted habitually by the Senator from Indiana, and on this special occasion with lusty sonorousness by the Senator from Illinois, has utterly failed to frighten a people risen in indignation at the overthrow, by military force, of their constitutional rights. But, should I be mistaken in this opinion, and the people have become terrified by this skeleton exhibition and cry of murder, then the empire is at hand; and the Senator from Illinois may congratulate himself on his foresight, as Mrs. Toodles congratulated herself on the purchase of the crutches, for having adopted in advance of the formal establishment of the empire, and given to the country through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, his heraldry and coat of arms, consisting of two marrowless thigh-bones crossed and surmounted by an empty skull. As all heraldry is symbolic, I read the present design to mean that the Senator thereby announces to the world that he has smitten his enemy hip and thigh and taken off his head.

Certain it is that there is no need for the honorable Senator to file a caveat to prevent piracy of his ingenious device and combination. His patent-right will never be infringed. For no one, not even a sawbones—no, not even a coroner, nor a grave-digger—will ever claim it as his family escutcheon. I doubt if even the Senator himself will wear it long, provided, like Nessus's shirt, it do not stick to him against his will. But, should he stand by his choice, there is one addition which I would respectfully suggest to enhance if possible the already unparalleled beauty and resistless attractiveness of the present device. The addition was suggested by the cruel slaughter of his former democratic allies by the Senator in his death's-head speech, and by his evident intention to spread terror throughout the land among aged women and sucklings and babes. And it is, that he will adorn his coat of arms with a tomahawk uplifted, and press wide open the jaws of the gaping, chapless, eyeless, noseless skull, so the terror of the young and aged may be greatly heightened by imagining that there is an unceasing war-whoop bursting in stentorian volume from that grinning vacuum. But, after all, the object of the Senator in adorning his remarks with the head and bones may be more ingenious than we have supposed. It is one of the amiable weaknesses of man to desire to live in the memory of posterity. This desire is the root and spring of all ambition. And it may be the Senator intended, that when some Old Mortality shall come to wander through that grave-yard of genius—the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—attracted by the only tombstone there, he would pause to observe this emblem of death, whose utter dryness so fitly typifies the offspring buried beneath, and over which the devoted parent, rejecting the heresy of the Sadducees and fondly but vainly trusting in the resurrection, has erected a monument so appropriate.

But, Mr. President, lovely as is this tombstone or armorial design, as the case may be, of the Senator from Illinois, it is not more admirable than the line of logic by which he endeavored to excuse or justify the military usurpation by the Administration in Louisiana. His defense—for be it remembered that the people have called the Administration to the bar of judgment to answer for a gross violation of their chartered rights—may be briefly stated thus: He answers, "We are not guilty, because this is not the first instance of military tyranny in the history of our Government;" second, "If the republican party is guilty, then the democratic party is also guilty;" and, thirdly, "If I, as a republican and supporter of the Administration am guilty now, it is not the first time I have been guilty, because I, as a democrat and supporter of a democratic administration, did the same thing in 1856." These premises being solemnly laid down, he proceeds to his "argal" and by crowner's quest law of logic draws his deduction, that the Administration is not guilty of military usurpation in Louisiana.

But this happy line of defense is not surpassed in its non sequitur by the dissimilarity between the historical incidents which he arrays in its support, and the one we are now considering. The first he referred us to was the action of General Jackson at New Orleans. General Jackson acted just at the close of a great war, when there were enemies of his country within his camp, and before the order establishing martial law, to secure a great victory, had been revoked. President Grant acted when the country is at peace with all foreign powers, and when there was no insurrection nor domestic violence. General Jackson acted for the good of this whole country. President Grant has acted to keep in power one man, who has been declared by a standing committee of this Senate and by the honorable Senator from Illinois, as a member of that committee, and by the President himself, not to be the lawful governor of Louisiana, and to seat republicans who by the unanimous report of a committee of the House, composed of two republicans and one democrat, were not elected to the Legislature. General Jackson acted at a moment of danger to the whole country and when the maxim inter arma silent leges is held to be right. President Grant acted at a moment of danger to the republican party and in a time of peace and on another maxim, which is, "I use the bayonet to silence the laws." General Jackson arrested one man. President Grant seized and holds to-day, under bayonet law, a whole State. Jackson, as soon as the peril to his country was past, when he had routed the veteran hosts of Packenham, laid aside his sword, dropped his conquering arm, acknowledged his error, bowed his majestic head to the law, and paid the penalty imposed by the court from his own scanty purse. President Grant, when he had at the point of the bayonet triumphantly routed five unoffending and unarmed citizens who were peacefully insisting on their constitutional rights, justifies the act by persisting in the wrong. There is, however, one coincidence in the careers of these two distinguished soldiers. It is that both were honored by the American people by being twice chosen their Chief Magistrate. But, one was chosen after his alleged usurpation—the other before.

The second instance of military usurpation under democratic rule cited by the Senator from Illinois was in the arrest of the fugitive slave Burns. This example is more unfortunate for the Senator than the first. That was done by a United States marshal under a statute of Congress, which was passed to enforce a provision of the United States Constitution, and the force employed by the marshal, who had been resisted and overcome, was the very kind of posse comitatus which the law of Congress, under which the marshal was acting, authorized him to employ.

The third instance of democratic usurpation cited by the Senator is more unfortunate, if possible, than either of the former two. I refer to the Topeka Legislature in 1856. In Louisiana the election was held by the whole people of a State. Whether Louisiana be a sovereign State or not, I will not now inquire. Whether any State in the Union, since the fate of Louisiana, be sovereign or has any reserved rights is a question of greater pertinence—of much graver doubt. But be that as the Administration may determine, we at least have supposed, though perhaps delusively, that the election held in Louisiana on the 3d of November last, was held in and by the people of a State. The people have always supposed, and the Supreme Court and the courts of all the States (excepting Judge Durell and the judges in Louisiana) have uniformly held, that in a State election the Federal Government had no control, and that the Legislature of each State and not the President, nor the Army, nor any officers in the Army, nor a governor, had the exclusive right to determine who were elected as members of such Legislature. The pretended election in Kansas was held in a Territory over which the Federal Government had exclusive jurisdiction and control; the Legislature of Louisiana was elected under the constitution and laws of that State. The Topeka Legislature was elected without any authority of law whatever; the Louisiana Legislature was a lawful body. The Topeka Legislature was not only unlawful but revolutionary; the members-elect of the Louisiana Legislature met in pursuance of law. The Topeka Legislature met at a time and place unauthorized by law.

The Senator was sadly mixed when he was trying to press this example into shape to make it appear analogous to the case of Louisiana. For in one breath he calls the Topeka Legislature that of a "free State," and in the next he calls it the Legislature of "an inchoate State." What an inchoate State is under our system of Government has never been defined by any lexicography I have ever seen. The latest edition of Webster's Dictionary, since the republican party came into power, has undergone many changes in its definitions, and this may be one of them. We may have States and "inchoate" States, Territories and inchoate Territories. But it may be that the bloody ghost of Louisiana rose before the Senator just at that moment in his guilty banquet, and so paralyzed his sophistry that the imprisoned truth of logic escaped from his restraining lips. For when he called out the words "inchoate State" he was unconsciously uttering the name of Louisiana. She is indeed an "inchoate State." She is not a Territory, for she has the mocking form and semblance of a State. She is not a free State, because she is under the military heel of one man. Her Legislature is organized by his command; it sits only by bayonet support; taxes are levied and collected only by military power; and she is indeed a State "inchoate." "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

But the honorable Senator still laid on, raising his bludgeon (or I should say his belaying-pin, as he announced himself in his opening sentence as a sailor) high in the air in the midst of the fog which by the heat of his own zeal he had raised around him, and like a blind cyclops he began to strike right and left, fore and aft, his friends as well as his foes. For he then began to belabor Abraham Lincoln for military usurpation committed under his administration. It is true that the Senator tried to fasten the guilt on McClellan, because he was a democrat. But how feeble the attempt! Mr. Lincoln was Commander-in-Chief of the Army; McClellan was his lieutenant and acting under his orders. This logic is on a par with the Senator's attempt to convince the American people that the usurpation in Louisiana is not the act of President Grant. He says:

> Sheridan had nothing to do with it, Grant had nothing to do with it, the Senate had nothing to do with it; but Kellogg must take the responsibility of issuing the order. There is the responsibility, and there is the whole of it. Your denunciation of President Grant for using the Army in a legislative body goes for naught, for he knew no more about it than you did until he saw it announced in the public prints.

Poor Kellogg, he has no friends! He is kicked by the democrats and he is kicked by republicans; by the Senator from Illinois, by the Senator from Indiana, by every Senator on the Committee on Privileges and Elections; he is kicked by the President; and yet they hold him fast in his seat, for no other purpose one would suppose, from the way they abuse him, but to kick him.

But the Senator says "Grant had nothing to do with it." Well, let us test the truth of this bold assertion. He says Kellogg issued the order for the military to invade the Legislature. What military? Of the United States, of course. Who is Commander-in-Chief of the United States Army, Kellogg or Grant? Who commands De Trobriand, Kellogg or Grant? Who commands Sheridan, De Trobriand's superior officer, Kellogg or Grant? Who sent the troops into Louisiana, Kellogg or Grant? Who keeps them there now, Kellogg or Grant? Ah, Mr. President, this defense is simply pitiable. It would not avail the Senator or do credit to his ingenuity before a justice's court, and yet it is gravely presented to the United States Senate. The Senator should not be blamed, however, for giving us nothing better. He deserves the same commendation which was bestowed on the widow who gave her mite. He has given us not only the best, but all he had.

But the Senator says that the President knew nothing of the military interference until he saw it announced in the public prints. No one supposes he did. When President Grant sent his commission to San Domingo he knew nothing of what they had done until they returned to Washington. But how did the commission get abroad? Did not the President send them? How did the troops get into Louisiana and into New Orleans? And why have they been held there so long? But, further, what has been the President's course since he knew what Kellogg did with the United States troops? He has ratified every act of Kellogg, be it right or wrong, by permitting the troops to hold in statu quo the Legislature as organized by Kellogg only by their assistance. While it is true that President Grant "did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officers in that State upon the subject prior to the occurrence," it is also true from his own statement that he sent troops to Louisiana under Kellogg's requisition, and allowed them to remain there from September 15 to January 4, "to render to Kellogg such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State." I shall use this fact for another purpose after a while, and I quote it here to show that the Senator from Illinois is not as candid in his defense of the President as the President in his own defense. The zeal of the advocate has outstripped the desire of his client.

At this point in the Senator's darkness and gloom the mist had so thickened that it seems he lost his hearing as well as his sight. For the Senator from New York, anxiously looking for him, but not being able to see his logical locus in quo and utterly powerless to extricate the Senator from his perilous situation, called out to encourage him at least by his voice. When the Senator from Illinois, imagining that McClellan stood before him, was hammering his friend Abraham Lincoln for the arrest of the Maryland Legislature, the Senator from New York suggested to him that "Maryland had not been declared in insurrection," and the Senator, clutching at anything for help, caught eagerly at the sentence, which came back re-echoed to the Senate, "And Maryland had not been declared in secession;" reminding me of the little boy who never learned his lessons, and who was asked by his teacher, "What river divides Maryland from Virginia?" A young friend sitting behind prompted him and whispered, "the Potomac," which the little idle and confused boy echoed back, "The Stomach River, sir!"

The Senator from California sitting near me then generously, but most innocently, came to the relief of the Senator from Illinois by offering him a copy of the Constitution. The Senator meant well, for his countenance betrayed sympathy and distress, but the aid he offered was a cruel piece of irony and satire. He ought to have known that the Constitution was the last thing the Senator from Illinois desired in his extreme situation. The satire of the proffered aid could scarcely be equaled by offering an anchor to a drowning man. The Senator from Illinois had no use for the Constitution at that hour. He was trying to save the Administration from condemnation for a violation of that Constitution. "Justice!" said the client to his lawyer who said he should have justice, "that's just what I don't want; if I get justice I'll be hung." The Senator from Illinois understands this case far better than does my friend from California. He should have remembered that the Senator from Illinois had just confessed in open court that this is the third scrape of this kind he has been in, and with his enlarged experience he ought to know the kind of defense to be set up. And he does know, as shown by the fact that he promptly declined the assistance so kindly but innocently offered by the Senator from California.

The Senator having at this stage of his struggle exhausted his own strength and that of his friends who had rushed to his relief, fell back as a desperate venture on the statements of Jack Brown, of Georgia, and E. M. Kiels, late of Alabama.

Mr. President, you are no doubt familiar with a historical event which occurred in this city during the administration of President Jackson. A stranger called on that Chief Magistrate, who from his personal appearance plainly showed that for worldly goods he was much in the same strait that the Senator from Illinois was for argument, law, and facts to support his defense of the Administration. On inquiry by the President as to the urgent nature of his business, he replied that he desired a foreign mission. On being told that they were all filled he asked for a consulship. The same reply being made, he asked for a postmaster's position, then for a clerkship, then for the place of doorkeeper, and all these being denied, he requested the President to give him a pair of his old breeches. The Senator from Illinois has at length got down to the pair of old breeches.

"What a fall was there, my countrymen." On reflection, however, the Senator did not fall at that moment. He was already down, and it would be more historical to say that on Brown and Keils he flattened out from absolute exhaustion. The honorable Senator set out with the high-sounding declaration that he would discuss this question "fairly, candidly, and truthfully, and from a just, honest, and legal stand-point." From such a thundering index we were delighted with the anticipation of a rich repast in the coming volume. Expectation stood on tip-toe, and we chided the too sluggish moments because they kept us from our feast of reason. But was ever realization so unlike anticipation? Instead of reason we had declamation; instead of the ascending we were borne on the descending scale; instead of analogues to support his assumptions we had prologue and epilogue with argument omitted; instead of facts we had rumors and fancies; instead of being luminous the Senator grew voluminous. He fell back, or came down, down from his lofty beginning until he was glad to avail himself of anything, even of the wretched comfort to be drawn from the statements of Jack Brown and E. M. Keils.

Having said so much as to the character of the Senator's argument, I shall now notice very briefly the kind of evidence which he adduced in its support. The charge against the President is that he has grossly violated the Constitution by putting the military over the civil power, and the Senator from Illinois sprang forward and took the whole case on his broad shoulders. He opened the case for the defense by producing a print of a skull and two bones to justify the President for dispersing a State Legislature, and proceeded to say:

> Now, I state it as a fact, and I appeal to the Senator from Louisiana to say whether or not I state truly, that on the night before the election in Louisiana notices were posted all over that country on the doors of the colored republicans and the white republicans.

The Senator in his place states it as a fact, not as information—but as a fact—that the death's-head image was posted on the doors of white and black republicans all over Louisiana. And he appealed in the same breath to the Senator from Louisiana to say whether or not "he states truly;" but the Senator from Louisiana opened not his mouth. And when the Senator from Louisiana refuses to open his mouth, on any pretext, in accusation of the democrats of his own State, we know he is only constrained by an attack of hopeless lockjaw.

The honorable Senator states it as a fact that this charming symbol of peace was posted "all over" Louisiana. He is the only witness on this point. Yet I believe he was not in Louisiana at that time. How does he get his information? From whom? How does he know the statement to be a fact? We are not allowed to doubt the statement, because when a Senator rises and states without qualification that he knows a thing to be true, to be a fact, we are, by courtesy, concluded. And as the Senator has told us he never "withdraws a statement," that "he is not of that kind," we must take it as true that this promoter of the elective franchise was posted "all over" Louisiana, and even on the door of Kellogg, who, we all know, required no intimidation.

The joy which I imagine the Senator felt in presenting the strange device of this unaneled skull and these thigh-bones to the Senate, is only comparable to that of Mr. Pickwick when he produced before the Pickwick club his treasured hieroglyphic stone, which, on being interpreted, was simply "Bill Stumps, his mark;" and the Senator was as profoundly convinced of wide-spread death and murder in Louisiana by the figures "2 x 6" written under these bones, as was Sergeant Buzfuz that Mr. Pickwick had made a violent assault on the affections of Mrs. Bardell, because he addressed to her the tender and endearing words, "chops and tomato-sauce."

The next fact which the honorable Senator from Illinois brought forward to show that President Grant had not been guilty of usurpation was a certificate that a barber was a member of a democratic club in New Orleans.

This is a fact produced by the Senator from Illinois; and I do not blame him for producing it, because it was probably the best he had.

It seems from this, that there was one Charles Durassa, a colored Figaro of New Orleans, a lineal descendant of a craft whose pleasure and profit were once measured by the quantity of blood they drew from their fellow-creatures. The ancestors were no doubt the founders of the Ku-Klux Klan. How natural, then, the Senator from Illinois might say, for their descendants to join that klan. But the descendants, having grown more humane, have, of late, ceased to grow fat on the plethora of their neighbors' veins, and derive their subsistence now by relieving their fellow-man of an excess of hair. But as the said Durassa—who had an eye to the main chance—could not find on the scalps and barren cheeks of his own race sufficient hair to whet even the appetite of his Sheffield blade, much less to appease his own, and not being honored with an invitation by Kellogg to share in the more substantial spoils he was gathering from the whites of Louisiana, he fixed his hungry gaze on the Caucasian Absaloms of New Orleans, and determined to put himself in the line to poll their heads. To this end he adopted the worldly wisdom of the "scurvy politician" and joined the paying side, and received his certificate of membership, which the Senator from Illinois has construed to be a notice to the Angel of Death abroad in Louisiana, like the blood sprinkled on the doors at the Passover of the Jews in Egypt, to let Durassa live. The shrewdness of the barber, Durassa, though not sufficient to excite the envy, is still enough to challenge the admiration, of the republican party. He knew there were no men in Louisiana with manhood enough to wear beards except the democrats, and that to set up a shop to shave his own brother would be a device not only entirely republican, but as absurd as to establish a ship-yard in the middle of the great Sahara Desert, and almost as hopeless as to expect peace and prosperity in the United States under the present Administration. But even this sharp resort to earn a penny is paraded before the country by the Senator from Illinois as proof of murder and death to all Republicans who could not obtain a like certificate. The Senator's ingenuity is even more creditable than the cunning of Durassa.

The next fact stated by the Senator to prove that the President was not guilty of usurpation in Louisiana was the kidnapping of a republican member-elect of the Legislature, called by one man, Cousin, and by another, Cousinier. "And yet," says he, "these kidnappers and murderers are not to be denounced in this Chamber. These are the gentlemen of Louisiana I presume." No; the kidnappers and murderers of Louisiana are no more the gentlemen of Louisiana than they are of Illinois. I will tell the Senator who is the kidnapper and murderer in Louisiana. I would not say he is an Illinois gentleman, but I will say that he is a man from Illinois. The kidnapper and murderer in Louisiana is Kellogg, a carpet-bagger from Illinois. Kellogg, in the vigorous expression of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] used on yesterday, "with falsehood in his hand and perjury on his lips," kidnapped the gubernatorial chair; in the language of President Grant, by a "gigantic fraud," he kidnapped the Legislature of that State in 1873; and he has by Federal troops and the fraud and perjury of his returning board, kidnapped the Legislature of 1875. As to who is the murderer of Louisiana, I say that the man who inaugurated these wrongs upon the people of Louisiana; the man who continues these wrongs; the man who summons to his aid the military power of the United States for the purpose of perpetrating these crimes, is himself responsible for every act of violence committed by the white people of that State in resistance to these wrongs, and the blood of every man who has fallen in this righteous struggle is on the garments of the usurping, perjured Kellogg.

But, sir, this is aside from the point and from my line of discussion. The Senator from Illinois said that Cousin was kidnapped by democrats to keep him away from the organization of the Legislature. I wish it to be borne in mind that the Senator stated this as a fact; not a surmise, not an inference, not upon information, but as a fact. I will leave this issue of fact between the Senator and two other republicans who are members of the House, and who went to Louisiana and examined into the question as to whether Cousin had been kidnapped by the democrats. I refer to their report, page 10. Mr. FOSTER and Mr. PHELPS, to say nothing of the democrat upon this committee, make this statement:

> The republicans claimed that one of their members, A. G. Cousin, had been kidnaped and forcibly taken to a district parish to prevent his presence at the organization of the house.
> Your committee was about to investigate this charge, when in public session it was claimed by the democratic counsel and admitted by the republican counsel that the arrest was under legal process and by the hands of the sheriff. It was further claimed, and not denied, that the privileges of his office did not shield him from arrest. The charge was embezzlement.

This statement of a republican committee was in the possession of this body and I suppose was lying on the desk of the Senator from Illinois at the time he made this statement.

Just here I will state that the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in his speech the other day, made the same statement. He stated as a fact, that Cousin was kidnapped by democrats for the express purpose of keeping him out of the Legislature. The latter made certain statements as facts which I have found nowhere else except in the paper to which I now make reference. If the Senator from New York relied upon any other evidence than this to which I now call attention, I should be glad if he would say so. I call the attention of the Senate to this paper to show that the Senator from New York, in his zeal in defense of the Administration—no, Mr. President, I withdraw that statement—the honorable Senator from New York in his speech expressly disclaimed that he was defending the Administration. He said:

> I do not appear for General Emory. I am not his attorney of record, or his counsel, nor is he triable here. I do not come to champion, justify, or befriend either of these persons. I do not appear to vindicate the President of the United States. He needs no vindication. He was a stranger to the whole proceeding. I do not appear to champion the republican party.
> It is no part of my purpose, I repeat, to vindicate Governor Kellogg. Much has been done in Louisiana, formerly and lately, on both sides, which I cannot approve. If my wish could prevail, iniquity, wherever found, would be chastised and eradicated. I speak only for common sense and common right. For this purpose I have nothing to do with Mr. Kellogg, except that he was acting governor of Louisiana.

I therefore withdraw my remark, that the Senator from New York was defending the Administration. I have yet to ascertain whom he was defending, because the list that has been furnished by him, it seems to me, covers all parties and persons that might by possibility have been concerned in that transaction. The document to which I call attention is among those furnished by the President in his message to the Senate, and was sent to him by General Sheridan. It is dated January 7, 1875. I call particular attention to the fact that it has no signature. It is waste paper, bearing no name, and purports to be a hearsay statement of the circumstances of the arrest of Cousin. The Senator from New York used it in his argument, and on its authority asserted as a fact, that Cousin was kidnapped by democrats to keep him away from the organization of the Legislature. The Senator did this with the words "no signature" at the end of this anonymous hearsay statement under his eyes.

The paper begins:

> About ten o'clock Thursday morning, A. J. Cousin and his father arrived in this city from Covington, Saint Tammany Parish. His statement is as follows.

Mr. Nobody says that Mr. Cousin said, he was kidnapped, and on the authority of the hearsay statement of a man in a mask, or of no man at all, the Senator from New York places his declaration, that Cousin was kidnapped by democrats.

The next fact relied on by the Senator from Illinois in justification of the overthrow of the State government in Louisiana is, that violence has for years prevailed in that State. He stated without qualification that thirty-five hundred murders have been committed in that State within "the last few years." And he says he makes this statement on the authority of General Sheridan. Well, the Senator does not withdraw his statements, as he is "not of that kind." But this is all one to me. I will simply put the statement of General Sheridan, who is the Senator's authority on this question of fact, over against the statement of the Senator, and leave them to settle the question. I quote from General Sheridan's report as embodied in the Senator's own speech:

> Since the year 1866 nearly thirty-five hundred persons, a great majority of whom were colored men, have been killed and wounded in this State. In 1868 the official record shows that eighteen hundred and eighty-four were killed and wounded.
> * * * There is ample evidence, however, to show that more than twelve hundred persons have been killed and wounded during this time on account of their political sentiments.

So it seems that General Sheridan did not authorize the Senator to say 3,500 persons had been murdered. He said that number within eight years, since 1866, had been killed and wounded. General Sheridan did not say, as the Senator does, that that number was killed and wounded for political opinions. General Sheridan does not say, that they were "all republicans, not one of them a democrat." How the honorable Senator, who never withdraws—is "not of that kind"—and General Sheridan will settle this slight discrepancy in statement, I cannot see, unless General Sheridan will withdraw and adopt the Senator's statement as his own.

The Senator, having finished his raid on Louisiana, passed over to Alabama and Georgia. And as a specimen of the material on which he built his castle in the air, I refer the Senate to his statement to show that intimidation of republicans is practiced there. He said that in the fourth congressional district, at the last election, only eighteen republicans voted out of a population of over 64,000, while over 9,000 democrats voted out of a white population of 67,000, and that only twelve republicans voted in the eighth district of a negro population about equal to that in the fourth. I must do the Senator the justice to say, that he was willing to stand corrected when my colleague told him there was no republican candidate in either district. But my purpose in citing this instance is to show the kind of facts by which he was supporting his charge of intimidation, that we and the country may see how utterly fanciful they are when the truth is known. Ab uno crimine disce omnes. And I will observe here that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] both reiterated the error of the Senator from Illinois as to the killed and wounded as stated by General Sheridan.

February 26, 1875.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights—

Mr. NORWOOD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I suspended my remarks the other day I was reviewing the speech of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I was endeavoring to show that he had made statements in his review of the causes of the trouble in Louisiana which were not sustained by the record.

The Senator from Illinois, in his anxiety to make out a case against the people of the South, came down to the statements of Jack Brown and E. M. Keils. I know the gentleman, Mr. Brown, and know nothing against his personal character. I do not know Mr. Keils, but I know he was judge of the city court in Eufaula, Alabama, and resigned to avoid impeachment on many grave charges of corruption in office. My object in referring to their statement is to show the character of facts which are relied on by the Senator from Illinois, to prove that President Grant has not been guilty of usurpation in Louisiana.

Here is a specimen taken from the letter of Jack Brown:

At midnight after my nomination scores and scores of democrats came to my hotel and serenaded me with tin pans, bass-drums, tin horns, pieces of old sheet-iron, &c., applying to me every kind of insulting epithets. The people were permitted thus to insult justice and right undisturbed by a vigilant police, and the next day were discharged by the mayor of the city when arraigned for disorderly conduct. On the same night these democrats went to the house of B. F. Bell, a republican, with their tin pans and other discordant instruments, serenaded and abused him for being a damned radical, in the presence and hearing of a sick wife.

Again he says:

In the city of Americus, where I live, there was but one place of voting. The ballots were handed to managers through a window. In front of this window the colored voters formed a line and stood throughout the entire day like a stone wall, each one waiting for his turn to vote. The democrats did everything in their power to break their line and scatter them. For instance, they would go among them puffing tobacco smoke in their faces, snatching tickets from them, throwing cayenne pepper among them, persuading, begging, and trying to bribe them to vote the democratic ticket. At least half of the colored voters were challenged, the challengers asking all kinds of silly questions, such as "Are you old enough to vote?" when perhaps the voter was fifty years old; "Have you paid your tax?" when the voter actually had his tax-receipt in his hand; "Haven't you got some other name?" and other foolish questions.

While the Senator from Illinois was thus presenting the case of the South to the country, I was thinking that he would have done well had he turned his face toward his own State instead of toward Louisiana, for it happened that just at the time he was addressing the Senate, Governor Beveridge of Illinois was making application to the Legislature of that State to make an appropriation of $10,000 to assist him in suppressing an incipient rebellion in Williamson County, which was formerly the residence of the Senator from Illinois. The turbulent spirit in that county had risen so high as to override the civil authorities; and the governor of his own State, while the Senator was here enlightening the country as to the condition of the South, and charging us with violence and the commission of crime, was unable without the assistance of the Legislature to suppress crime and violence in Illinois.

But, Mr. President, there is no community, there is no society, there is no deliberative body that does not have its Mrs. Jelleby. You will find Mrs. Jelleby everywhere. She is personified in almost every assembly. Mrs. Jelleby had her Borrioboola-Gha. She must send assistance to the Africans abroad. The poor, the helpless at home received no commiseration from her, but all her philanthropy and her devotion to human rights was expended upon Borrioboola-Gha, somewhere in the midst of Africa; and here we have Mrs. Jelleby over again. While the people of every northern State, while the whites are being ground by poverty, all the sympathy and all the philanthropy of their Senators here have been expended upon the negroes in the South.

Mr. President, it would be well, if some attention was devoted to their own people. The poor they have with them always, and while the poor are suffering, while the finances of the country are depressed, while we have been brought to the strait in which we are by a republican administration, the wrongs and the evils that their own people suffer are lost sight of and they, forsooth, must devote all their talents, and waste the public time here that might be devoted to an alleviation of the condition of their poor, in considering the condition of the negro.

Referring again, for a moment, to the statement of facts made by the Senator from Illinois, and which I have been reviewing, I ask, is it not lamentable when a Senator, one to whom the people look for light, for information, for guidance, will, for partisan purposes, to support a bad cause and to defend a defenseless case, libel the white people of a whole State—of a large section of the Union—as murderers, assassins, and banditti on rumors reaped from the air on which they grow, or on a statement of facts which when touched vanish like bubbles? This is a fair illustration of the justice which the leaders of the republican party mete out to the South. This is the quality of evidence on which we are arraigned without warrant and condemned without hearing. This is the kind of evidence—and I wish the fair-minded, true-hearted, honest republicans in the North to hear it—with which their leaders deceive and mislead them; arouse their prejudices against us who are one with them in race, hopes, interest, patriotism, and destiny. This is the evidence on which their leaders reconstruct States, disorganize labor, embroil society, foment war between the races, drive northern capital from the South, destroy the South as a market for the products of their factories, their looms, their furnaces, and fields. Such evidence would not be received by Justice Shallow in a cause between man and man on an issue involving the life of a dog. But the leaders of the republican party receive it, and on it base legislation palpably unconstitutional to create strife between whites and blacks and to furnish fresh cause for further aggression. On such evidence and by such legislation they are widening the breach between the sections which have been honestly struggling for nine years of grief, to reunite in the cordial bonds of one harmonious brotherhood.

But the Senator from Illinois, having finished his discussion of law and facts, gracefully swept away into the region of poesy.

With "most excellent fancy" he delighted the Senate with a picture of a gallant ship scudding before the gale with sails all full, pennant flying at the mast-head, and bearing, like a rich argosy, her precious freight of the Constitution and the hopes of a happy people. I listened with a pleasure not unmingled with some apprehension for his own safety. I feared he had launched a craft too light to live in such a heavy sea.

The old ship which he described is manned by the Administration. Her captain, slumbering in his cabin and never looking out to mark the weather or to watch for danger, had left the ship in command of his lieutenants, Kellogg, Packard, and Durell, who reported everything lovely, and all clear ahead. The chart—the Constitution—had been laid aside and was never consulted. While the captain slept, the officers and crew caroused. But suddenly the old ship struck, and the Administration, seeing their danger, gave the signal of distress. And then it was, the Senator from Illinois rigged his craft and put out from shore to the rescue of his friends. It was a right gallant act; for while "it is decorous and sweet for one's country to die," it requires a marvelous degree of heroism to rush on certain death to save a man whose friendship, at best, is of doubtful assurance. But soon a fog gathered round about that daring sailor, and the harder he pulled, and the farther he went, the denser grew the fog. His friends on shore became alarmed, for they saw that he was heading on fearful breakers, while the sailor in happy innocence was alone unconscious of his peril. Soon he was lost to sight, and like the "babes in the wood," he began to move in a circle, for the fog was so dense that, though amidships, he could see neither stem nor stern of his own craft. But at last he struck on a rock and for two days hung suspended, and as the fog for a moment lifted, the wistful faces of friends showed too plainly that they were painfully suspended on the "ragged edge of anxiety" for his fate. As the little craft of this adventurous sailor there heaved and pitched and thumped and bumped, his situation and impending fate suggested to my mind the foundering of a Mississippi scow, as witnessed and immortalized by a western poet, who sang in description of her wreck—

She hove and sot and sot and hove,
And high her rudder flung;
And every time she sot and hove
A worser leak she sprung.

[Laughter.]

But the honorable Senator—I beg pardon, the courageous sailor—after struggling and tugging for a while to extricate himself, and blowing his fog-horn for two days to warn his friends that he was lost, and finding that there was no hope of relief, heroically resolved on a sensational farewell, and charging himself with a bomb-shell of rhetoric, he blew himself to pieces with a dash of spray and a detonation which would have aroused Neptune to arms in defense of his invaded realms.

The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PEASE] has also paid his distinguished consideration to the State of Georgia. Mistaking perspiration for inspiration, as some are wont to do who seek to soar, he labored for two days to give the world assurance that his hind-sight is quite as good as his foresight, and to tell us a part of what he does not know. Ah, what a work of supererogation! Had the honorable Senator attempted to tell us what he knows, there might have been a saving of much valuable time and printer's ink. Would he had done so. But he saw fit to open his budget of fables and to defame a people whom he does not know. These people are my constituents, and the constituents of—no, I cannot say that, as I do not know who are the constituents of the honorable Senator from Mississippi. I presume, from his abuse of them, they are certainly not the white citizens of that State. If they are not, then his constituents must consist of the only other classes in the State—the negroes and the carpet-baggers. Of the first class I have nothing to say. For that people, in the main, I have great respect and entertain the kindest feelings. They are naturally kind, docile, tractable, and faithful. But they are ignorant, superstitious, and clannish. And from these qualities spring the dangers to themselves and to the native white people of the South. They are pipes on whose stops any knave can play.

They are incomparably the more respectable of the Senator's constituents. And yet I fear the negroes of Mississippi are not up to the standard of loyalty which makes a citizen of the South respectable. I fear they, too, are growing slightly rebellious. There are ominous indications that they are becoming a little select in their society of late, and it may be that Congress will have to reconstruct them; for when the honorable Senator called and cried aloud, "Let us have Pease," they rebelliously stiffened their necks and replied, "We prefer to have Bruce." There is no accounting for taste, even that of our colored fellow-citizens. They are wonderful imitators of the Caucasian race, and we know that there is a strong and constant tendency in our own race to choose, in business affairs and in social relations, the best there is at hand. The negroes of Mississippi may not be an exception to this rule.

Further than this I do not propose to follow the Senator from Mississippi. I would as soon attempt to seriously discuss the truth or falsehood of the stories of Scheherezade in the Arabian Nights Entertainments, as the myths which make up that Senator's speech.

But, Mr. President, during the progress of this discussion the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] addressed the Senate, and I must express the pain that I felt at the words that fell from his lips. When the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] with his heart full of devotion to the Union, to law and order, told yuo the true condition and feeling of the southern people, and assured you that they, too, are true to the Union, the Senator from Massachusetts, even while the spell of the eloquent words of my friend still held us like the enchantment of a delightful dream, arose and not only rejected the assurances, but said he could "observe elements of danger in the speech which, if not removed from the minds of the people of the South, will end in civil war." The war, sir, which will result from the sentiments uttered by the Senator from North Carolina would indeed be civil, very civil. It would be a war of competing looms, a war of rival factories, for commercial mastery, of scholars for ascendency in the field of letters, of mechanism and of mind. And the influence which would animate the combatants to glorious deeds would not descend upon them from the angry face of fiery, bloody Mars, but it would come as an inspiration, with the voice of "peace on earth, goodwill toward men," from the risen Star of Bethlehem. But let the views of the Senator from Massachusetts come into active operation, and the war would not be quite so civil. It would be, perhaps, of a class in which the Senator might prefer to occupy his seat in this Chamber rather than to buckle on his sword and move to the front as the appointed agent to enforce by compulsion quiet and harmony among the contending forces.

The Senator seems to be perfectly convinced that the South can never enjoy peace until "the whites and the blacks are compelled to go to the same schools, sit upon the same forms, accept the same teachers, and study the same books." This may be true. The people of the South have had no peace for forty years on account of the negro. It may be possible that the Senator is right in his opinion that we shall never have peace until we "sit upon the same forms" with the negro. He has made other wonderful discoveries before. I am at a loss whether to admire him more as a humanitarian philosopher, or as an exploring astronomer. As an astronomer, he, about six years ago, while peering through his immense telescope, discovered "a hole in the sky," and, singular enough, that hole was in the southern sky. And the Senator now, as a moral philosopher, as a humanitarian, has discovered "a hole in the sky" of southern society. It stretches wide between the constellations of Ham and Shem, and as the honorable Senator, like nature, abhors a vacuum, he now proposes to fill up this hole in southern society by drawing these recalcitrant, repelling, social elements together. He proposes to capture them with a lasso, drag them humanely to the same schoolroom, tie them on the same forms, lash their arms together to hold the same book, fix their eyes on the same page, make their eyeballs stationary, and then, by some patent process as yet unknown to any one except the inventor of this exquisite machinery for the propagation of knowledge and peace among men, to wind up their brains like eight-day clocks, and set their tongues, like pendulums, in motion, to tick out learning in harmonious measure. [Laughter.]

But the honorable Senator, though not very happy in imparting to our minds any new discoveries in social science, did inform us of a fact which to all enlightened men on both hemispheres, and especially to the people of Massachusetts, must be news indeed. In presenting his own views of the Constitution, liberty, and the Union in their harmonious relations to each other, the thought seems to have broken in on the Senator's mind, that a critical reader might discover some discrepancy between the sentiments he was expressing and those which, as a nation's oracles, were uttered and impressed on the American heart for forty years by Daniel Webster. And the ingenious Senator saw no escape from the grasp of his formidable antagonist except to slay him in cold blood; and accordingly he astonished the civilized world by the announcement, for the first time made, that Daniel Webster had fallen, and that, too, by his own hand. The honorable Senator informed us that on the 7th of March, 1850, "in the rock and tumult of those times he (Daniel Webster) felt that concessions must be made; he yielded and fell."

If it be true that Daniel Webster fell, then let the world wear mourning! If it be possible that Daniel Webster deserted the cause of liberty, who can ever have faith again? If the righteous could not be saved, where shall the ungodly appear? No, sir; Daniel Webster "still lives." His fall would have shaken the continent with a vibration as great as that from an earthquake. Daniel Webster fallen! As well might a Persian have attempted to persuade the Greeks that Jupiter had fallen from Olympus, as the Senator to satisfy Americans that Daniel Webster fell away from the Constitution. We would as soon expect to hear that the brightest star in the heavens had madly shot from its appointed orbit. No, sir; the Senator must be laboring under some cruel delusion. He must at some time have seen the little finger of that mighty intellectual Samson, in horizontal repose, and looking up at it from his stand-point, have believed it to be the prostrate form of its giant owner. If the Senator will graciously permit one so humble as myself to turn his eye for a moment to that field of learning over which, in violation of the fourteenth amendment, according to his own construction, he has a chartered monopoly, I will remind him that astronomers tell us there have been stars which were ages ago consumed by the intensity of their own heat, and that their light is still streaming, and will continue for centuries to pour, in undimmed effulgence upon the earth. And the light of the bright mind of Daniel Webster, though the orb itself from which it beamed be quenched in the darkness of the grave, still illumines and will continue to illumine the pathway of man, until the earth itself shall be rolled away as a scroll.

But, sir, I have some views of my own which I desire to express, and I cannot, therefore, consume any more time in replying to the speeches which have been made in defense of President Grant. And I will say here that it is not my purpose or desire to retort on any Senator by using epithets, or by the attempt to disgrace or defame or bring into disrepute the people of any State in this Union. I am not one of those who believe that all the virtue of our race, all the statemanship, all the true elements of civilization, belong to their State or section of the Union. And when I hear an American from one section accusing the citizens of another section of all manner of crime, and claiming by inference if not in terms, superiority for himself and his constituents over all other Americans, and of course over all the rest of mankind, I at once suspect that his education has been neglected and that he should be placed under a tutor and made to travel. He may know something of books; is no doubt thoroughly familiar with the tenets of the Pharisees, but his subjective knowledge is lamentably deficient. He knows nothing of himself or of his fellow-man. He either has not read the history of the race to which he belongs, or, reading it, he has not seen its philosophic teachings, and has only retained its dry and useless facts. He is but a walking hortus siccus, bearing in his memory only the skeleton of history without its life and spirit.

But I cannot believe—I wish I could—that the leaders of the republican party are ignorant of the philosophy of history, of the fact that the laws which govern the moral are as fixed and unchangeable as those which control the physical world. I wish I could believe they do not know that human nature works with unvarying regularity under the same circumstances. It would be charitable to think so, but we cannot so believe. The Senator from Indiana has reminded us during this debate, that human nature is the same everywhere and at all times. He knows, then, that like causes operating on mankind always produce like results. He knows that a sense of wrong begets resentment. He knows that a superior race will never tamely submit to the enforced dominion of an inferior race. He knows that a former master will not cheerfully take the subordinate place of servant to his former slave. He knows that intelligence, and the manly pride which is but the consciousness of superiority in intellect, culture, social position, and in all the elements which make up true manhood, have never yielded without resistance to be governed by an ignorant, semi-barbarous tribe. He knows, too, that such a state of things is in violation of the spirit and genius of American civilization, and has no parallel even in the most despotic and tyrannical governments of ancient or modern times. But we all know, that all these monstrous wrongs and a thousand more have been forced upon the people of the South by the republican party for eight years gone by.

I have no hope that anything I can say will reach the hearts of the leaders of that party. Their motto, if we may judge by their acts and legislation, is, "We will rule or ruin." They look to but one end, that is to perpetuate their power. But there is a court of appeal, which is the judgment of the American people, and to that I appeal for justice to all sections and all races. And to this end I shall now for a few minutes review the course pursued by the republican party toward the South ever since the close of the late war between the North and South.

That war, sir, was fought on a principle. Its origin was in a difference of opinion on the right construction of the Constitution. We of the South, honestly believing that rights which we held were guaranteed by that instrument, could not be preserved in the Union, sought to secure them under another and an independent government. We struck no blow at the existence of the Federal Government, and so impartial history will pronounce its verdict. But we all know the result. When the war closed, we laid down our arms, went peaceably to our homes, and set to work. The scene was sad beyond the power of mortal pen to tell. Two billions of property in slaves had vanished in a night. More than another billion had crumbled under the iron tread of war. Hundreds of millions more invested in confederate bonds were swept away in a breath. Many millions more of confederate treasury notes perished in the same instant. Besides all this, nearly every planter was in debt, and his land which in the main was all that was left of his estate, was covered by mortgage. Labor was disorganized. Negroes, elated by freedom, like children by new toys, played and danced and loitered. The white people were disarmed, but negroes were allowed to have arms because they were pronounced loyal. Farming utensils had been destroyed, stock had been used up in the army, and cattle largely consumed for commissary supplies. Such is but a very meager statement of facts setting forth our financial and social condition. Of our untold sorrows, of homes desolated by death; of ghostly chimneys that alone marked the spot where the mansion of opulence, refinement, and culture had stood; of the graves destined to be leveled by time and nature's pelting elements, because the surviving kin, so rich in love, were too poor in purse to erect an humble slab to mark the spot where all they cherished in life was sleeping; of the wealthy who in the sweet spring-time of 1865 awoke to the poverty of the manger and rose to wander in woe and without a home, till the kind hand of the hermit Death shall lead them to his welcome abode—of these and much more I shall not speak. They have a sacredness over which pride and manhood keep eternal watch. They are all our own. They are issues of the war which we accepted; and the same manhood which met the embattled legions of the North without dismay, will cloak our private griefs without repining.

But under all these discouragements, all this poverty and insolvency, up and out from the dark and bitter waters we moved once more to the shore and met Fate face to face and closed in for an almost hopeless struggle.

It was then that the President of the United States issued his proclamation that we should rise and rehabilitate the Southern States and return to the enjoyment of the rights which the Constitution guaranteed to every State. We held conventions, abolished slavery, reorganized our governments, and elected Legislatures and members of Congress. Throughout the years 1865 and 1866 there was but little disturbance between the two races. General Grant, who had been sent by the President to ascertain the condition of affairs in the South, reported, in December, 1865, that quiet prevailed, and that the intelligent, controlling citizens accepted the situation in good faith.

And just here let me remark that at that hour the republican party held in its hands the grandest opportunity that has ever been seized or dropped by any king, monarch, ruler, or party known in history. A spirit of magnanimity which would have required no sacrifice of advantage from the war, nor the surrender of any principle of good government, would have won the southern heart, would have given that party legitimate control of the intellect and patriotism of every Southern State, and have continued their rule for at least another generation.

When the Southern States had reorganized and elected their Senators and Representatives, and they came here and applied for admission to their seats, on inspection and examination of them by the republican party it was discovered, first, that they were all white men, and, secondly, that they were all democrats. The republican party challenged the array, and Congress decided they were incompetent and unfit, and sent them back. And instantly another discovery was made, which was, that "no legal governments existed in any of the States lately in rebellion." These States had not been "in rebellion" for two years. They had been under the watchful eye of the republican party every hour in the day and night for these two years. That party had sat by and heard the President call on them to rise and take their places in the Union, had seen them rise, hold conventions, elect Legislatures, elect Senators and Representatives, and nothing was said. But when those Senators and Representatives came forward with their credentials, marvelous to relate, these States were suddenly discovered not to be States.

Then there was enacted a drama which, but for the calamities with which it was fraught, would rank as the greatest farce known in history. Then came that grand abortion called reconstruction. In its train have followed more pangs and woes than war with all its horrors has. It was a crime, because it was a willful trampling of the Constitution in the dust. It was a dishonor, because it was an insult to a fettered people. It was a disgrace to American statesmanship. It was a blow at the life of the Republic. It disfranchised the intelligent, the virtuous, the honorable citizens of the South, and gave power over them to the ignorant, the licentious, and the base. It gave those who had neither property nor education the power to tax without limit the owners of the remnant of property left to them by the war. It bound the hands of the whites and turned them over unprotected to the unbounded rapacity and savage brutality of the blacks.

And why was all this done? Was it because the people of the South were disposed to take up arms again? No one has ever been bold enough to suggest such a contingency in justification of reconstruction. Did the North, victorious and unimpaired in all the strength and appliances of war, fear a people conquered, disarmed, scattered, without leaders, or organization, or money? No one is simpleton or coward enough to make this a pretext for reconstruction. Was it because we were turbulent and unruly? No, sir; history does not show it. The legislation of Congress does not assert or even assume it. The preamble to the act for reconstruction does not declare it. It states expressly the ground on which Congress pretended to base its action in destroying the autonomy of ten States, and that ground was, that no legal governments then existed in those States. Let this be remembered now and forever. It was solely on the assumption that no legal governments existed in these States. There was no social disturbance in the South. There were individual instances of violence, such as must occur in the nature of things at the subsidence of every great civil commotion. They occurred in the North, and are occurring there now as well as in the South. They are occurring now in several of the Northern States—Iowa, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and notably in Illinois.

What, then, was the motive of the republican party in subverting the governments of the ten Southern States? It was only to perpetuate its own existence and keep control of the Government. All these crimes were committed to keep power in its hands.

Now, sir, I have asserted that all the evils which the South has endured were the offspring of reconstruction; and I assert in the light of history that the violence, the bloodshed, the conflict of races which have taken place are the legitimate, the natural results of the same fruitful cause of our immeasurable calamities. I have shown that we were at peace before that iniquitous step was taken; I have shown that we were not able or disposed to take up arms; I have shown that Congress did not pretend that reconstruction was necessary to suppress domestic violence; and I have shown that Congress expressly asserted by solemn enactment the ground and the only ground on which it would stand for justification in entering on the perilous experiment of destroying, not one State, but near one-third of the States in the Union. Now let us see whether the violence in the South is not traceable directly to the republican party.

I have already said that the laws which control the conduct of men are as fixed as the law of gravitation, and that under like circumstances mankind will manifest the same qualities of heart; and this law, which is general to the human family, is especially true of a single race, of a single family of that race, and of a single people born and educated under the same Government and institutions. What is true of the people of one section of the United States is true of any other. We are all born freemen. Our earliest lessons teach us to abhor kings and tyrants, to resent wrong, to resist oppression, to protect at the risk of life, our honor and our homes. There is nothing in the past to justify any American statesman in supposing that the people of the South are in this respect inferior to any people known in history. Their record in the Revolution, their heroism in the war of 1812, in the war with Mexico, and in the late civil war, attest their lineage as sons of freedom. Nothing, sir, has occurred in the South that would not have been done by the people of any State in the Union had they been the victims of like wrongs and oppression.

Crime in Massachusetts is less than the crime committed in newly settled States in the West, because her social organization is older and the relations and rights of men and their remedies for redress are better established. She has had no social revolution within two hundred years. There are no disturbing forces pressing upon her from without. But, subject her people to-day to the ordeal through which the people of the South have had to pass, and the same social forces will instantly appear which have disturbed the South for the last eight years. Double her population, and let one-half be a people of an inferior order, a people ignorant and poor, superstitious and vile, and having from previous servitude no individuality and but little conscience. Then clothe them with equal political rights in a day and turn loose among them a band of hungry, greedy, unscrupulous adventurers from another clime, who have no interest in the State but to get office to rob, and to do which they engender distrust and revenge in the breasts of these savages by working on their superstition and persuading them, the people of Massachusetts intend and are trying to enslave them again, and her condition would be but a feeble picture of the South. But what would be the result? I ask the Senators from that glorious old Commonwealth which struck the first blow for constitutional liberty on this continent, would his sons tamely submit to such a wrong? Would they sit passive and hold their hands while looking at these incendiaries putting the torch to their factories and their dwellings? Would they stay their hands when these robbers had burdened them with a tax which would take their houses from over their heads to pay the debt? Would they stand idle and see their credit ruined, their fields becoming fallow, their judiciary debauched, their governor robbing the treasury, their Legislature an organized mass of ignorance wielded by hostile knaves, and their homes pallor-stricken by the constant dread of arson, rape, and murder? No, no! Faneuil Hall would again quiver with the eloquence of her patriot orators, and Bunker Hill would tremble under the indignant tread of her marshaled heroes. They would rise in their strength and drive these demons headlong into the sea.

But, sir, reconstruction was accomplished. Near a million negroes, finding themselves voters, became more turbulent than before. Crimes multiplied with amazing rapidity. Murder, red-handed murder, threatened the white race by day, and arson became an institution of the night. Blazing gin-houses, on the least fancied wrong, illuminated the dismal night like merry bonfires, and the profits of a year dissolved to ashes in an hour. Thefts were as common as opportunities; and opportunities were forced when not to be found. In the rura, districts, female honor was so often violated, that men and women dreaded the coming of night, and many abandoned their homes and took refuge in the cities. Let me state a fact in the history of Georgia as a proof of what I say of the prevalence of crime. The judges appointed by Governor Bullock in 1868 were all republicans, with but one exception. They could hardly be charged with injustice to the blacks. Under these judges the number of convictions for almost every grade of crime can be imagined, in absence of accurate criminal statistics, from the statement, that during Bullock's term of four years, he pardoned over four hundred negroes who had been convicted of crimes of all kinds, including murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, burglary, robbery, and all others down to petit larceny. From the number thus pardoned you may form a general estimate of how many must have been convicted, and the number of convictions must, in the nature of things, be far short of the number of offenses committed.

But such was the state of immorality and crime which followed naturally the sudden enfranchisement of a people who knew not how to exercise any of the privileges growing out of their new and intoxicating condition. Then, sir, what must follow, in natural order, such a state of things as this? You do not need to be told. Ask yourselves what you would have done under such a trial? You would have done what every community on earth, Christian or pagan, would. You would have protected your homes, your property, your families, and the honor and virture of your wives, sisters, and daughters by every means that God and nature had given you. The early settlers of California when infested by thieves and lawless men, finding no protection in the law, became a law unto themselves, and by an organized force, called a committee of vigilance, restored order to the community. Many citizens of the South in communities where the negroes were in the majority combined for self-defense. This was the original motive—nothing more. But, as in all organizations which operate outside the forms of law, so in this, violent men, who often have private grievances to revenge, crept in, and the purpose of the organization, which was simply for protection, was perverted and unlawful aggressions followed. And at this point of deflection, what was intended only for self-preservation, changed into what is commonly known as the Ku-Klux organization.

But who was to blame for this? Can any fair-minded man say that the original intention to unite for mutual protection against such lawlessness, was not justifiable? Who is responsible for a conflagration; the man who sets the torch to the building, or the flame which he kindles? The republican party must have known the nature, the ignorance, the passions, the unbridled lusts, and the low moral sense of the negro in the South. They knew the history of Hayti and Jamaica. They knew the violent social disturbance which would inevitably follow the freedom, enfranchisment, the political equality, of the negro race, inflamed as they were, by incendiary office-seekers, against the native whites. And the results are only such as any statesman would have foreseen, and such as any one, who did not value party dominance more than the good of his own race and of his common country, would have exerted every effort to prevent.

But I am glad to see, that while the President charges the existence of disorder, he, inadvertently, no doubt, places the responsibility where I have already shown it rests, and that is on the republican party. He tells us that "lawlessness, turbulence, and bloodshed have characterized the political affairs of Louisiana since its reorganization under the reconstruction acts." And here is the key that unlocks the secret of all the trouble in the South. He strips the mask from his own party with one brush of his hand. Reconstruction is the evil genius of American civilization. It arrested the progress of the whole Union, as the breath of the monster which appeared in the pathway of Regulus checked the onward march of his army. It was that lawlessness on the part of Congress which begat lawlessness in the people. It was that disregard for the rights of white citizens, in order to make republican voters of the blacks, which convinced the people of the South that the Government had cast them off, or was holding them for adventurers to plunder through the power of an ignorant, pliable negro constitueucy. It was that futile but wicked effort of the republican party to legislate a stupid, unlettered semi-savage into an American statesman. It was that folly of hitching the white man between the shafts and mounting the mule in the cart to hold the lines and drive. Reconstruction will be written down by the philosophical historian not only as the greatest folly of all time, but as the worst crime against civilization, human progress, and self-government, that was ever perpetrated through the cunning or wickedness of man. It has no justification. The people of the South were not permitted to show what they would do to reinstate themselves in the Union. You did not give them the opportunity. You would not give them a trial. There was no locus penitentiæ allowed them.

You legislated, in the language of Thaddeus Stevens, "outside of the Constitution," to crush the pride, the manhood, and destroy the material interest of the South for the sole purpose of getting control of the political power of those ten States. And the whole country has been paralyzed by that monstrosity in statesmanship. We were seized by the throat just as we were attempting to rise from the ashes of the civil conflagration, knocked down, and bound and placed under guard of our former slaves. Evil upon evil has followed the march of the republican party in the South since reconstruction. The North has suffered in all its industries and the South has been almost destroyed as a market for the North. Their factories have been lying idle for want of purchasers. Their poor have been thrown out of employment and sent shivering, wandering, naked, hungry, and begging into the streets. The public Treasury has been exhausted in maintaining a few vagabonds in power over the Southern States. Insurrections have followed, State governments have been overthrown and set up by the bayonet at the call of worthless, homeless adventurers, because for the loaves and fishes they claimed to be republicans, and the whole country has been convulsed and alarmed through fear of civil war. Every State over which these heartless, unprincipled scapegraces have obtained control has been the theater of riots, bloodshed, ceaseless commotion, and in several, of dual governors and dual Legislatures engaged in open war. As long as we lie supinely and let these vampires suck our life-blood, there is peace; but when we rise and shake them loose, we are disloyal. If we order them from our grounds when crawling around a negro cabin, the President is telegraphed that we have insulted the flag, and they rush to Washington and cry piteously for protection and to be allowed to return to their leeching. Sir, it was a cruel punishment which Samson inflicted when he caught the three hundred foxes, tied them in pairs with a firebrand to their tails and turned them loose to burn the corn and vineyards of his enemies. But it was a more wicked and destructive punishment which the republican party inflicted on their own race, their own fellow-citizens, weak, defenseless, stricken in poverty and sorrow, when they turned loose a thousand remorseless adventurers, as firebrands between the races. Samson slew his thousand enemies with the jaw-bone of one ass, but the southern people, white and black, have been smitten and slain with the jaw-bones of a thousand asses. The Administration accepts their frantic stories as gospel truth and rejects the sworn statements of the truest and bravest men in the South, laymen and clergy. Northern men and Union soldiers, who have gone South since the war to engage in legitimate business, also add their testimony to our own; but they are not politicians—do not bow the knee to Baal; do not devote themselves to strife and plunder—and their voice is not heard. Officers of the Army when sent to investigate and report are not heeded. And special committees of Congress (republicans,) when they deny the statements of these carpet-baggers, are insulted by their own party and called renegades and liars. And when we put these creatures of reconstruction out of office and establish stable and peaceable governments, the cry is raised that it is the peace of intimidation. But, sir, this train of thought is too melancholy for me to pursue it further. If I could believe that the good people of the North who love honesty, truth, liberty, and good government are willing to indorse the action of the Administration toward the South, I should lose all faith in the stability of the Republic.

I come now to consider the action of the Executive in the part he has taken in the affairs of Louisiana. And here I must premise, that he who expects to hear denunciation fall from my lips, will be disappointed. I shall use no language which is not respectful to the Chief Magistrate of this Government. However much I might condemn his action in this or any other matter, I should extend to him that courtesy which, as a member of a co-ordinate and coequal department of the same Government, I would exact of him. Denunciation proves nothing. One fact is stronger than the strongest vocabulary of vituperation. Logic may be enforced by rhetoric, but rhetoric without facts or argument is idle breath. Genius may create the one, but truth must supply the other. The truest eloquence is often but the simplest narration. The strongest reasoning is often but a statement of facts. The grandest, the most terrible denunciation is the condemnation pronounced by truth.

But, before proceeding to the facts, I beg just here to enter my protest as a Senator, and as an American citizen, against the implication which runs through the discussion of this question, that any condemnation of the acts of the Executive, if made at all, must be uttered with bated breath. No American citizen, however humble, need walk in the shadow of even the Federal Executive. He is but a citizen clothed for a brief hour in the life of the Union with a power not his own, but delegated by the people, to be exercised for the common good. He is but a steward, and to be called to a strict account for the unfaithful discharge of his duty. The law is alike his master and our own. It is as much mightier than he is, as forty million people are mightier than one man. It is as much superior to his will, as is that of six million voters, whose will is embodied in and constitutes the law. It is grander than all mortals. It is as sacred as personal honor. It is as dear as life. In it are all the issues of freedom; without it there is no safety, and just beyond and contiguous to it is the boundary of the region of anarchy and death. The American people cannot afford, however strong may be their sense of gratitude and obligation to any man for any service, to permit him to lay unholy hands on the ark of the covenant.

The President, in his message to the Senate, was not content with stating the facts responsive to the inquiries embraced in the Senate resolution. He entered into an elaborate discussion of the whole Louisiana troubles. He goes back to 1868, and sweeps together all the disturbances which have occurred, both political and personal, quarrels and affrays. More than this, he discusses the questions of law which arise out of these unhappy events. Still further he undertakes a defense of Durell, which he was unwilling to make for himself, and to avoid which he resigned his office. And all this I am sorry to say the President of the United States, of the whole people, does in what seems to be the spirit of a partisan.

The President prejudged the case and then set to work to make an argument to support his judgment. He tells us (page 6) that "each branch of a legislative assembly is the judge of the election and qualification of its own members" and in the next breath he decides the question of the election and qualifications of the members of the Legislature of Louisiana, by telling us in unqualified terms, that "Nobody was disturbed by the military who had a legal right at that time to occupy a seat in the Legislature."

The President first decides the question for the people of Louisiana that the House of its Legislature was an unlawful organization; that it was but "a democratic minority organized by fraud and violence by trampling law under foot;" and then he decides for that branch of that Legislative Assembly, that the members who were seated had no legal right to occupy seats in that body. Again he says, (page 5,) "I am well aware that any interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of the State Legislature, or any of its proceedings, or with any civil department of the Government, is repugnant to our ideas of government."

He goes on to say—

I can conceive of no case not involving rebellion or insurrection where such interference by authority of the General Government ought to be permitted or can be justified.

"No case not involving rebellion or insurrection," says the President. Was there rebellion in Louisiana in January last? Was there insurrection or rebellion in the Legislature of that State on the 4th of that month? Who has ever asserted there was? Has any champion of the Administration ventured on the assertion? What is a rebellion, or insurrection? It is, briefly, an armed uprising against and resistance to the constituted and lawful authority of a State. And what constituted and lawful authority of a State was the disturbance which occurred in the organization of the House against? Was it rebellion against the executive or the judiciary of that State? Was it against the constituted Legislature of that State? No, sir: there was no Legislature, and it was a disturbance not extending to blows even, which arose in the organization of one branch of that Legislature. That body, then assembled under the ægis of the constitution, was sacred against all interference except by its own order and will. Had the members fallen upon each other by the throats and taken life, the only interference which could have been justified, would have been to preserve the peace of the State and to make the offenders answer for whatever crime they may have committed. The governor had no right to interfere until the violence might have swelled to proportions beyond the power of the house to control it, and he could in that event have done nothing more than keep the peace. He had no power to establish or remove a doorkeeper even—much less a member of that body. In Ohio, in 1844, two bodies, claiming each to be the lawful house, sat for two weeks in the same room. They had the power and the right to sit or not to sit, to organize or not organize, and the Governor of that State had no more right to disturb them than he had to disperse Congress. So in Louisiana, neither the President, nor the Governor, nor Federal soldiers, had the right to cross the threshold of that house without permission first asked for and granted.

Republicans need not be troubled with the doctrine of state sovereignty, which vexes their souls like the ghost of a murdered foe, to find this law. It exists as a necessary element of our system of government, even if the States be not sovereign; and when it ceases to be law—constitutional, fundamental law—when a State legislature no longer has absolute control over its own action and plan of assembly, the Republic will be lost in despotism. But I return to the message.

The President says that nothing except rebellion or insurrection can justify interference by the General Government with the organization of a State legislature. He says, in other words, that the interference by the military of the General Government in the organization of the Louisiana legislature, or with its proceedings, cannot be justified unless that legislature was in rebellion or insurrection.

But, assuming that the President is right, and admitting for argument's sake that insurrection or rebellion can be committed by members-elect in the mere act of organizing themselves into a legislature, (which with all respect I conceive involves a legal absurdity,) how does he apply the law thus laid down when he comes to the facts of the case? No case not involving rebellion or insurrection can justify Federal interference, he tells us. As Federal interference did take place—as he is defending that interference—as he has taken no steps to undo what he has done by Federal bayonets—we naturally expect him at the next step to tell us, or attempt to show us on the facts, that rebellion or insurrection existed when his troops interfered and organized a State legislature. Hear him in the next sentence. Does he say there was rebellion, or insurrection, or bloodshed, or a riot? No; the expected plea of justification for his military is not put in, and in its stead (I say it with all respect for the President) we hear a plea which, if entered to a charge on the criminal side of a court, could be called nothing but the plea of insanity or infortunium; for he says—

But there are circumstances connected with the late legislative embroglio in Louisiana which seem to exempt the military from any intentional wrong in the matter.

I will say here, before proceeding to show, by his own confessions, the great wrong which the President has done, that I shall not dwell on the details of the acts of either democrats or republicans in the organization of the House on the 4th of January. It has been shown by several Senators on this side that the organization took place according to law, even though it was done in a boisterous manner. I shall not occupy this ground, which has already been so fully and ably reviewed; first, because I could only repeat what has been so well said; and secondly, but mainly, because I do not consider it material. I regard it as a side issue. Whether the organization was regular or irregular, was lawful or unlawful, does not affect the main question. The request of Wiltz to the Federal military to preserve order was a great mistake. It was inviting a Federal officer to do what he had no right to do. His presence in that house was a humiliation to the State, it matters not by whose request or whose order he went there. It was the duty of that house to preserve order by the authority vested in it and necessarily belonging to it, and to do so by the forces of the State. So, on the other hand, if the republicans were the lawful house, they should have used the same power. I justify neither democrats nor republicans in the use of Federal troops. If they were not allowed to assemble in the State-house, they should have organized elsewhere. It would have been their right, as well as their duty, to employ the power which is vested in every Legislature for its protection. A body calling itself the Legislature of Alabama two years ago met, not in the State-house but in a court-house, and their organization and proceedings were held by this Senate to be valid. The men, and not the place, make a Legislature legal.

But the manner of the organization, the legality or illegality of it, are all aside from the solemn question presented to the American people by the conduct of the troops in Louisiana. In discussing it I shall not assume any doubtful ground. I waive the question of the legality of the action of the President in suppressing the violence on the 14th of September. I will grant, for my purpose, that his action then was right, and I take the question of fact from that time on the President's own statement. I shall raise no question of fact which any friend of the President on this floor or elsewhere will deny, for I shall use no facts except those relied on by the President himself in his own justification. These are enough, more than enough, to convince the candid mind which is seeking for truth and is not blinded by party zeal that neither the President nor his defenders on this floor have met the true issue face to face and overcome it. The solemn questions which the freemen of America are waiting to have answered are—

First. By what authority of law did the President of the United States, who by the Constitution is sole Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, delegate and resign this exclusive constitutional power to the governor of Louisiana?

Second. By what authority of law did the President of the United States, sole Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, turn over his troops and ships of war to the governor of Louisiana, to be used against the citizens of that State when and how he pleased, and for an indefinite period of time, and to enforce any law of the State which he, the governor, might wish to enforce?

These are the questions which remain unanswered. They go to the heart of the issue now pending between the republican party and the people of this Republic. Are the facts assumed in these grave inquiries true? Let us look to the message of the President to test their truth. The argument is brief, for it consists in a recital of the President's own statement and admissions and the reading of but one clause in the Constitution.

He tells us that "early in last summer (1874) the troops were all withdrawn from the State (Louisiana) with the exception of a small garrison at New Orleans barracks," &c. Quiet prevailed there until the 14th of September. Then domestic violence occurred, and he sent troops again into Louisiana. He issued his proclamation for the insurgents to disperse. They did disperse, as we all know, without raising an arm against the Federal Government. They surrendered every position which they had taken, resigned every office they had assumed, and Kellogg and his party were at once reinstated. And now comes the statement—the admission which excludes all hope of escape from condemnation.

Troops had been sent to the State under this requisition of the governor, (that is, of September 14,) and as other disturbances seemed imminent, they were allowed to remain there to render the executive such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State and repress the continued violence which seemed inevitable the moment the Federal support should be withdrawn.

Here is his confession that the troops were left in Louisiana after the domestic violence was over; that they were left there because other disturbances seemed imminent, and that he left them there "to render the executive (Kellogg) such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State." With these facts before us, let me place by them the only clause in the Constitution which can justify Federal interference, under any circumstances, with the people or government of a state.

I quote the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Every State shall be protected against invasion and domestic violence. That means, sir, against domestic violence in being, not against "disturbances which seem imminent." It does not mean against violence which by the President's own admission was past, which had subsided without the necessity of striking a blow or firing a gun; a violence which was hushed into obedience by his voice. But the President allowed his troops—no, sir, not his troops, but the Army of the United States, composed of freemen and citizens of the United States, organized, fed and clothed by the whole people of the United States and in part by the citizens of Louisiana, whom they were left to crush—he allowed the United States troops to remain in Louisiana, not to suppress domestic violence there in action, but "to enforce the laws of the State." What are the laws of Louisiana? They are her statutes and Code Napoleon, and the President turned over the troops of the United States to Kellogg, to be used by him at his will, to enforce any and all laws of that State. With them he could collect taxes if any resistance was made to the demands of his cormorant tax-gatherers, and with them he could oppress the people on the appearance of any opposition to his usurped power, and he, Kellogg, was to be the sole judge of the occasion when he should order United States troops to march against and shoot down American freemen. Do I state the case too strongly? Let the President himself answer for me and vindicate the charge. In attempting to excuse the Federal troops for their unlawful conduct in taking five men by the collar, who had been seated in the House and leading them out, he says, (page 6:)

Knowing that they (the troops) had been placed in Louisiana to prevent domestic violence and aid in the enforcement of the State laws, the officers and troops of the United States may well have supposed that it was their duty to act when called on by the governor for that purpose.

Again he says, (page 8:)

Under these circumstances the same military force has been continued in Louisiana as was sent there under the first call, and under the same general instructions.

But again and in still stronger terms the President admits the fact. On page 6, last paragraph, he says:

Whether it was wrong for the governor, at the request of the majority of the members returned as elected to the house, to use such means as were in his power to defeat these lawless and revolutionary proceedings is perhaps a debatable question, &c.

What further proof do we need than this, that the President delegated his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the Army to Kellogg as to the forces then and now in Louisiana? He sent the officers in command of those troops to Louisiana with "general instructions." What were those general instructions? He tells us that they were to aid in the enforcement of State laws. To aid whom? To aid Kellogg. Who was to judge when such aid should be rendered; the President or Kellogg, the officers or the troops? Kellogg and no one else, which is shown by the fact that on the 4th of January last, when the disorder occurred in the organization of the house of representatives in Louisiana, Kellogg did not make an application to the President for protection, stating that there was domestic violence, as the Constitution requires him to do. He did not say, "Domestic violence prevents the assembling of the Legislature, and therefore I, as governor, make the application," but he issued his order as governor to Colonel De Trobriand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would ask the Senator whether Mr. Speaker Wiltz, as he called himself, did any other or different thing? Did he apply to the President, or did he apply to the commander of the troops?

Mr. NORWOOD. The Senator, I am sorry to learn, has not heard me up to this time, or he would have heard me say awhile ago that I thought the application of Mr. Wiltz was unjustifiable. I do not justify Mr. Wiltz nor any one else in applying for Federal troops to interfere in the organization of that house.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if I do not disturb the Senator, may I ask him, that being the case, how he says that the President is responsible?

Mr. NORWOOD. I am endeavoring to show that; and if the Senator will listen to me I think I will show him; at least I will give him food for reflection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the Senator hear my question?

Mr. NORWOOD. I am listening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My question is how he holds the President responsible when, upon the only evidence we have that I have ever heard of, the President was as ignorant of what was to take place or what took place on that occasion, until it all had occurred, as the Senator himself or myself?

Mr. NORWOOD. I cannot repeat all I have said. The Senator has not heard the premises with which I set out, and consequently he probably may not so well understand the deduction that I am drawing. I say the President is responsible, and I say it because he put it in the power of Kellogg to do what Kellogg did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator to maintain that the President was wrong in overthrowing the Penn operations of the 14th of September, if I am right in the date?

Mr. NORWOOD. If the Senator will ask me a question that is pertinent to the point I am discussing, I will answer him; but I do not think his inquiry has anything to do with this question. If the Senator wants to know whether I think the President was wrong in delegating power to Kellogg to overthrow the State government or to enforce the laws of the State of Louisiana, I tell him yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but that does not answer the question. The President overthrew Penn on the 14th or 15th of September, whatever the date was, upon the application of the only person who was then exercising executive authority in the State of Louisiana. Now, in order to understand the application of the Senator's remarks, I wish to ask him whether he maintains that in doing that thing, under the circumstances then existing, if the President did do it, the President was right or wrong?

Mr. NORWOOD. In order to avoid all difficulty on questions of law that have no application to this case, and all issues of fact about which there might be dispute, I stated in the beginning that I should introduce no facts except those that are stated by the President in his message, and that all questions of law arising out of the disturbance of the Penn insurrection, or the suppression of it by the President, I should waive, and I take the facts and the law from that date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why will not the Senator say?

Mr. NORWOOD. Granting for the sake of argument that it was right, that answers the Senator. I proceed from that point to show that what followed was wrong in law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator why he will not grant it as a fact if he thinks so, instead of for argument's sake?

Mr. NORWOOD. Because it is not necessary to my argument at all. I say, admitting that it was right at that time, what occurred in January, nearly five months after, was all wrong, and I am endeavoring to show that the President is responsible for what occurred, because he put the troops under the command of Kellogg, turned his back upon the scene, and left Kellogg to use them as he might please.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not unpleasantly interrupt the Senator——

Mr. NORWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to ask him whether he thinks that under the Constitution, when the President has been called upon as on the 14th or 15th of September, by executive authority to aid in suppressing domestic violence, the next day, the violence not being repressed, nobody being put under arrest, and everybody merely having gone back to his place of rendezvous, it is necessary then, in order to overturn a revival of the same insurrection or domestic violence, that the governor of the State and the commander of the troops must wait until the President of the United States, two thousand miles off, can be communicated with?

Mr. NORWOOD. I do not think that another application is to be made every day, or every two or three days, or every week.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was sure the candor of my friend would admit that.

Mr. NORWOOD. Certainly I do not think that; and if I had had the honor of his attention up to this point, he would have seen the drift of my argument, and that his question was unnecessary. I will briefly state my position.

A disturbance occurred on the 14th of September. On the day following the President sent troops into Louisiana to suppress that domestic violence. Now I take the position that in point of fact there was no other domestic violence there from that day until the present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That requires proof.

Mr. NORWOOD. And I attempt to prove it by the message of the President. This is why I said, I assumed no fact that was in dispute. No domestic violence has occurred there from that day to this. The imbroglio, as the President calls it, on the 4th of January did not even amount to a blow by the fist; no assault and battery occurred, not a single drop of blood was shed; and I am going on to show that under this state of facts the President of the United States placed ships of war, and infantry and cavalry and artillery, under the command of Kellogg, and left them there from the 15th of September until the 4th of January under the control of Kellogg; the President himself being by the Constitution the only person who can control and issue orders to these troops. When the disturbance occurred on the 4th of January no application was made to the President. When Kellogg made his request, which amounted to a command, on De Trobriand, he did not report the fact to the President, and the matter was thoroughly understood between the Department here and Kellogg and the troops in Louisiana, that whatever orders were issued by Kellogg should be implicitly obeyed and carried out. That is my line of argument.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded to a motion that the Senate take a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.]

At the evening session—

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President, when the Senate took a recess I was endeavoring to show that President Grant is responsible for what occurred in Louisiana the 4th of January; and, in order to show that, I was giving the facts presented in his own message in which he tells us of the purpose for which those troops were sent to Louisiana and for which they were left there from the 15th of September until the 4th of January.

The President did not judge of the necessity for troops on that occasion as the law requires him to do, and why should he, after having delegated to Kellogg that constitutional power vested in him alone? No orders were issued by the Commander-in-Chief of those troops to suppress domestic violence. No, sir, none of these requirements of the Constitution and laws of the land were complied with. But the President's lieutenant—one he had appointed without warrant or shadow of law—a governor, or rather one acting as governor, issued his orders to a colonel of the United States troops to move them against the freemen of a State and drive them from their places in the capitol. But the President does not leave any room for inference as to the power he placed in Kellogg's hands. He admits that after he sent the troops to Louisiana, he left them to obey Kellogg's orders. Speaking of the affair of the 4th January, he says, (page 5, bottom,) "I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State, upon that subject, prior to the occurrence." This shows that the officers were sent there under "general instructions;" that Kellogg did not make known to the President what was transpiring on the 4th, (for the President learned of the despotic step taken by the troops through the press on the 5th of January,) and that he was not consulted by even his own subordinate officers before they obeyed the orders of Kellogg. Who can doubt, therefore, that the general instructions given by the President to his officers extended to obedience of any orders Kellogg might issue on his own motion and of his own wicked counsel to enforce any law against that distracted people?

But this, deplorable and condemnable as it is, is not all. I have said that the President placed the military of the United States in the hands of Kellogg for an indefinite time and a discretionary service. He sent them to him on the 15th September. He held them there under the representation of that usurper—trembling for his office and spoils—that further danger was apprehended. The election passed off quietly and peaceably on the 3d of November, and still Kellogg commanded the troops. November and December passed off as September and October had, without domestic violence, but the State still continued a military camp. January came and the bayonets still encircled the usurper. The President held them still subject to Kellogg's behest. He knew of no necessity for their continuance, for he says that he did not know that the trouble of January 4 was even anticipated. So, without excuse, he held the State under military power even after he had reason to believe domestic violence was imminent. And the President thus abdicated his constitutional power over a portion of the Army; delegated the command to Kellogg; issued none but "general instructions" to the troops; instructed them to obey Kellogg in any step he might take to enforce any law of Louisiana; placed no limits to his instructions as to how far the troops should go in obeying Kellogg; kept them under Kellogg's will for over three and a half months when the citizens were quiet and peaceable, and has held that State under bayonet rule, and crouching before the guns of armed ships, for more than a month since the last disturbance in the State—a disturbance, sir, in which not even a blow with the fist was struck. If this is lawful, what act of the Federal Government in crushing a State would not be lawful? If a State can be kept under military power for near five months because a cowardly governor apprehends trouble, what limit is fixed beyond which such despotism cannot be enforced? The same power which holds Louisiana in its iron grasp can hold every Southern State and every Northern State. The pretext for this oppression can be alleged against any other State when it should be made to appear that such State must be bound in fetters to prevent a rebound which would depose by election the republican party or a usurper. And should the American people submit tamely, supinely, and without protest to this incalculable wrong, the Republic is at an end, and let us hail the empire at once and stop the struggle.

But, sir, I have a few words more to say on this message. It is a sweeping indictment against the people of the South but especially against the people of Louisiana. I wish to call your attention to the evidence in which the President places implicit trust and has presented in support of his charge, and on which he acted and gave Kellogg an army to crush a State. I will not consider the statements of General Sheridan, because they are not stated on his own knowledge. They are only hearsay. He arrived in New Orleans in January last and his reports are based on what he has gathered from others. He does not even say who his informers are, or how his information is derived. And, first, the witnesses whose statements the President relies on are all republicans, and therefore all partisan. Secondly, no witness swears to his statement, though that perhaps would not add to its value, as their word is worth as much as their bond. These two facts are enough to make any judicious, impartial judge or juror skeptical at the opening of the case. But they are, with one or two exceptions, all carpet-baggers, who having no business at home go abroad to intermeddle with the business of others. Fourthly, they are all office-holders. These facts ought to be enough to "make the judicious grieve," and even a republican doubt. Listen to the names of this cloud of witnesses: William Pitt Kellogg. The William Pitt sounds excellently well, but there is a terrible decadence as we step from Pitt to Kellogg—Kellogg the immaculate, who, as the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] a republican of unquestionable faith, a gentleman cautious in judgment, clear in perception, and prudent in expression, tells us, obtained his office as governor "with falsehood in his hand and perjury on his lips"—Kellogg the patriot, who has been sacrificing himself on the United States Senate and on the governor's office for the good of the republican party and his own pocket for six laborious years—Kellogg, the hero who, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of Louisiana and of Longstreet, on the 14th of September last, while desperately willing to immolate Kellogg on the altar of liberty, nevertheless reluctantly consented to retreat to the custom-house to preserve the sacred person of the governor, is the first and main witness. If he could not say, as he reached that sanctuary, with the Apostle Paul, "I have fought the good fight," he could at least have said "I have finished my course" in the fastest time on record, and "kept the faith" by saving the governor for the republican party. [Laughter.] I know of but one other man in all history who could have drawn the same delicate but very plain distinction, when one sees it, between Kellogg the man, and Kellogg the governor. But danger sharpens Kellogg's perception most miraculously. He could swear—if his office depended on the distinction—to the exact line in the rainbow where yellow ends and orange begins. And as the President puts him up as the first and leading witness, his discrimination, apart from his absolute impartiality, commends him to our confidence.

The other person I refer to is Major Lewis Merrill, who is another witness introduced by the President. His order of intellect is, if possible, even more prismatic, when under oath, than Kellogg's when he is under fire. Merrill, when at Shreveport in command of his regiment, made affidavit before a civil magistrate to have certain persons arrested for alleged crimes; and when condemned for taking part as Army officer against the citizens of Louisiana by becoming a prosecutor on the criminal side of the court, he overwhelmed and silenced the Secretary of War and the President by "emphatically claiming" (to use Colonel Morrow's own language) "that his act was that of Lewis Merrill a citizen, and not of Major Lewis Merrill, an officer of the Army." As "in the mouths of two or three witnesses a matter shall be established," I do not see why the President did not rest his case on the testimony of these four witnesses: Kellogg, the man, Kellogg, the governor, and "Lewis Merrill, a citizen, and Major Lewis Merrill, an officer of the Army." And let me here protect myself from all suspicion or charge of disloyalty in presuming to speak of an Army officer, by affirming that what I say of Lewis Merrill, is of "Lewis Merrill, a citizen." I have the profoundest consideration for "Major Lewis Merrill, an officer of the Army." How fortunate it is for me that Lewis Merrill is two different men! But, however clear this fact is to either Lewis Merrill, or to Major Lewis Merrill, Colonel Morrow, an officer whose statements do not, chameleon-like, take color from his surroundings, whose honor as a soldier or a gentleman is not the minion of power, does not see so clearly the distinction between the officer of the Army and the politician-citizen making partisan affidavits, for he continues his report by saying:

> Whether a military officer in an important command can separate his private from his official character, and, without subjecting himself to censure, take original action in his own person whereby he becomes identified with political partisans, and whereby also the whole Army is brought into disparagement in the minds of many well-disposed people of the country at large, and whereby also the reputation of the service for fair and impartial conduct in the delicate and responsible duties it is required to perform in conjunction with the civil authorities in this and other Southern States is impaired, I leave, without any expression of opinion on my part, to the decision of higher authority.

If that "higher authority" ever made a decision on this perplexing duality, the message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of War to the Senate do not disclose the fact. Perhaps they tried to administer a proper censure, but when they approached "Major Merrill, an officer of the Army" he disappeared, to their bewilderment, in "Lewis Merrill, a citizen," just as, to the entire satisfaction of Robert Dale Owen, Katie King, the terrestrial, vanished into Katie King, the celestial. The capacity and determination of "Major Lewis Merrill an officer of the Army," to organize States, (as we shall see directly,) and the keen analysis and clear perception of his own want of identity, mark him as a man of "fate and metaphysical aid." He is just the man to pacify the South; for when Lewis Merrill a citizen shall fail—if failure can be supposed of one with head so clear—to swear his antagonists into prison, he can then fall back and call on "Major Lewis Merrill, an officer of the Army" to pacify them by the "moral influence" and the "moral suasion" of his troops; for the major does not omit to tell us that he understands the purpose of making a military camp of Louisiana, is "to maintain civil law, first, by the moral influence of glittering bayonets, and next, by physical force."

The next witness is Mr. Packard. He needs no introduction to this body. He is chairman of the State central republican executive committee. Upon his misrepresentations, says the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] troops were sent to Louisiana in 1872 for the purpose of enforcing the order of Durell, and upon that order and by the assistance of those troops, the government of Louisiana was overthrown. This is the man who during the last election intimidated the people of Louisiana—and by that I mean the democrats—by scouring the State from one end to the other with a military posse for the purpose of serving blank warrants. This is a matter of record.

W. H. Twitchell, another witness, is a State senator and a warm supporter of Kellogg. He was defeated in the election of 1872, but seated nevertheless under Durell's order and by Federal troops.

J. R. Beckwith is the United States district attorney in Louisiana, and he "settled" in that State when he was appointed to that office after the war.

W. G. Brown (colored) is from Jamaica. He was defeated in 1872, but was counted into the office of superintendent of education by the "Lynch board." Before his elevation to this position he kept a gambling-house for negroes

Charles Clinton also "settled" in, or rather on, Louisiana after the war. He settled into the office of treasurer; and he has confessed on the stand in court that he diverted funds intended for payment of interest on State bonds to fit out Kellogg's gun-boat, and his excuse was that he desired "to clean out the rebels."

J. H. SYPHER, C. B. DARRALL, and F. MOREY also "settled" in Louisiana after the war, and are members of Congress.

A. B. Levisa is another witness. He acknowledged before the subcommittee of the House, Mr. FOSTER chairman, that he was not elected to the Legislature, but he was returned to the present house by the returning board.

J. Madison Wells is another. It is sufficient to say of him that he was president of the late returning board in New Orleans, who in violation of law and their oaths rejected twenty-nine men who were clearly elected to the house, as has been admitted by every member of the committee of the House of Congress who were sent to New Orleans to inquire into the action of that board.

The President also presents a telegram from Mr. Hewlitt, the mayor, which I will read. It is addressed to the Attorney-General, dated September 19, 1874, and is as follows:

> The timely arrival of Federal troops has saved the lives of unoffending republicans. We look confidently to the loyal North for the support which they have so generously extended the weak, and hope the protection of the Government will continue until the elections are over. Life is dear to us, but we cannot risk an article so precious when surrounded by murderous white-leaguers.
> ROBERT HEWLITT,
> Mayor.

We know what he is from the above dispatch. He understands the situation in Louisiana. He knows the danger is grossly exaggerated, for he does not wish for troops any longer than "until the elections are over." The election is his refuge of safety. All he wants is an election. He knew who would do the counting. He is so full of the huge jest of the necessity for protection, that he grows facetious in his application to the Attorney-General. He speaks of life as if it were a bale of goods, and intimates that it is too dear to be parted with unless he could get a bigger price than the amount of his salary as mayor. And yet, Mr. President, I am credibly informed that, grotesque as this dispatch is, the witness Hewlitt has sworn, before an investigating committee, that the whole dispatch is a wicked forgery.

That reminds me of a specimen of this evidence which I was about to omit. It has been alleged that the democrats in Louisiana attempted to break up a majority of republicans in the house by arresting one man who would have made a quorum. That man is named A. J. Cousin. In reference to that transaction the President, on page 26 of his message, gives us a document that is signed by nobody, has no authentication, and is of no more value as a matter of evidence than so much waste paper which might have been picked up on the street or in a gutter. But I need say no more of this paper than to remind the Senate that it is the same on which the Senator from New York relied to demonstrate the kidnapping of Cousin.

There is another significant fact disclosed in one of the documents accompanying the President's message, which I will now bring to the attention of the Senate, and which is ominous of evil to the whole country. Whether it escaped the notice of the President I cannot say. I take it that he did not see it, or he would have attempted an explanation of its meaning. The President says in his message that the officers and troops were sent to Louisiana with "general instructions." What these instructions were, however, he did not see fit to inform us. The scope of those instructions was a very fitting subject to communicate to the Senate, as it might show on whom the blame rests for the overthrow of the State of Louisiana. But the fact I have to deal with is found in one sentence of the report which Louis Merrill, major of Seventh Cavalry, made from his headquarters, Upper Red River, December 30, 1874, to the adjutant-general of the Department of the Gulf at New Orleans. Major Merrill says—and I call especial attention to this quotation

> It is, I think, pretty well understood that my instructions cover the following points and will be carried out: That I organize as the legal State officials only such persons as are recognized as such by the recognized executive or judicial officers of the State.

Major Merrill, commanding a regiment of United States cavalry on Red River in Louisiana, receives "instructions" as to what part he is to play in the dreadful drama of overthrowing the sacred rights of American citizens and freemen in the State. And he writes to the adjutant-general of the Department of the Gulf, "Let it be understood that I will carry out my instructions." He does not disclose the author of those instructions. They remain a State secret that rests in the breast of the star chamber. Whether they went forth from Washington to this faithful servant, who with alacrity and burning zeal emphasizes his subserviency and purpose to earn the meed of "well done," or whether the adjutant-general instructed him directly and but repeated what he had been instructed by his superior officer, we are left in doubt.

But of one fact we are not permitted to doubt, which is that Major Merrill was instructed by an authority higher than himself and one which he felt bound to obey. An Army officer is not bound to obey any one except another Army officer of rank superior to himself. But let us contemplate for a moment, dispassionately if we can, the deed he was instructed by some one in authority to commit. He was instructed, which means he was ordered—for instructions to a military officer from his superior are commands—and he must obey, or refuse at his peril. He was, therefore, ordered to organize a State government. He was ordered to organize only such State officials as Kellogg might select and name, or the courts might recognize. He is commanded, under penalty of sentence of court-martial, loss of his commission, or other punishment, to receive from the hands of Kellogg a list of the names of such persons as he might nominate, and to organize them as the legal officers of that doomed State! But this willing, zealous, eager organizer of governments for States proceeds to a further rehearsal of the part he is appointed to perform, and excites our admiration for his valor, while he allays all apprehension for his success. He assures his superior officer that he understands his duty by stating the second part of his role to be, "that in the legal exercise of their official duties such officers must not be violently disturbed or interfered with; and if such violence occurs, it is my duty to suppress it, and that I will do so." Commend me, sir, to that young man as a maker of States and governments. He is evidently a man of nerve, and dutiful withal. He gives rich promise of distinguished rank in the new art recently invented by the republican party of dissolving States by act of Congress, and more recently improved upon by a drunken judge—Durell—and now rendered facile by that magic solvent, the sword. He has instructions first to organize the civil affairs of Louisiana and to suppress any opposition to them in the legal exercise of their official duties, and he assures us he "will do so." He of course is to be sole judge of what is a "legal exercise" of the duties of those civil officers, and to "suppress" at will all opposition.

But, sir, this is but the report of a subaltern to his superior; he is but rehearsing to show he knows his part in the drama. The plot is not his own. Another and a higher head has cast the play and arranged the tragedy. A stronger hand controls the machinery. And the question springs to the lips of every one, Who issued those instructions; who ordered this subaltern of the Commander-in-Chief to organize the civil officers of a State by force of arms? I will not say the President did it, but I do say, the President is responsible for it. And I am justified in saying so. These instructions either issued from the Department of War or from some officer under its authority, or they emanated from Kellogg. I have shown that the officers in Louisiana "were sent and allowed to remain there" under control of Kellogg. The orders to Merrill must have been issued by the adjutant-general of the Department of the Gulf, and he acted either by direction of Kellogg, or the general commanding that department, or by the Department of War in Washington. If they were issued at the direction of Kellogg, then the President is responsible for the deed, because he admits that he placed the officers and troops in Louisiana subject to Kellogg's direction and without restraining their service by any specific instructions. If the instructions were issued by any of his subordinates, the responsibility is his in law and in fact, unless he repudiated them as soon as he was informed of them. But he knows they were issued, for he attached Merrill's report to the message he sent to the Senate without a syllable of disapprobation. In either event, the President is responsible for these orders to subvert civil authority by the sword, and he stands responsible for the overthrow of the Legislature, because he voluntarily gave Kellogg the power by which the deed was done. I do not say that the President sent troops into Louisiana for the express purpose of overthrowing her Legislature, but I do say that to Kellogg, a man not an officer under his command, a man who holds his place as governor by what the President in his message denounces as a "gigantic fraud," he committed the military power, of which he is by the Constitution sole commander, and thus aided and enabled Kellogg to do the deed.

I do not say that the President directed those unwarrantable, unpardonable instructions to be given to Merrill, but I do say that some officer under his command is the guilty author of them, and that the President, with knowledge of his act, has uttered no condemnation. But what does it matter to the people of Louisiana whether the one or the other be the fact? If their liberty is lost, what boots it to them whether the hand by which they have fallen, struck by intention or by mistake? What consolation can they draw in their ruin, from speculation as to the motive of their destroyer? If a madman rush into the thronged street with deadly weapon and slay the passing stranger, the anguish of the loved ones bereft is none the less because the fatal missile missed the foe at whom it was aimed. If your neighbor, knowing that a desperado desires your life but has not the power to overcome you, lends him a fire-arm with which the bloody intent is carried into effect, your murder would be none the less complete and bloody, even though your neighbor should protest above your grave, he did not do the deed. Whether the liberty of American freemen in Louisiana has been destroyed by intention, or by a blunder, is not the question. The fact is before us that the executive arm of the Federal Government supplied the power by which their subjugation was accomplished and by which it is continued to this hour.

But I now ask your attention to a cipher or secret telegram sent by Colonel Emory to the Adjutant-General of the United States Army on December 13, 1874, as given on page 65 of the letter of the Secretary of War to the Senate:

[Cipher telegram.]

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 15, 1874. (Received December 16.)

TO ADJUTANT-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY:

The returning board and people representing opposing party differ on vital questions. Each avers against the other crime of such enormity that, in the present excited state of the public mind, violence is imminent. On the occasion of the 14th of September I was informed, in a dispatch dated 15th September, that the President directed you to say previous orders are not to be observed; in consequence of which, my order to Colonel Brooke to recognize Governor Kellogg was revoked and an interregnum intervened. To avoid future misunderstanding in the impending disturbance, which may happen at any moment, or may not occur until after the meeting of the Legislature in January, I asked to be informed if the instructions contained in your dispatch of September 18 are to be considered in force, or if I am to await the result of another application from Governor Kellogg to the President.

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel and Brevet Major-General, Commanding.

What the instructions in the dispatch of September 18 from the War Department to General Emory were, we are left to ascertain by deduction. General Emory on the 16th of December appealed again to the War Department, and begged that the question asked in his former dispatch should be answered. Here is the supplicating request. I ask attention to this dispatch:

In this connection I beg to refer to my cipher dispatch of yesterday, and beg that the question therein asked may be answered. In the absence of information, I proceed on the assumption that the instructions in the dispatch from the Adjutant-General of September 18 are to continue to govern me in the event of another outbreak here or in the country; and, in following out these instructions, grave results may follow, which it may not be the intention of the General Government should occur.

This is a most remarkable dispatch. General Emory implores for other instructions to guide him in the event of another outbreak and warns the President that in case he must carry out his instructions of September 18th, (those "general instructions" which the President tells us he had given to General Emory,) "grave results may follow which it may not be the intention of the General Government should occur." I suppose there is no one, not even a republican, who will not be surprised when I announce to the Senate and to the country the fact, that to this second dispatch, this imploring appeal on the part of General Emory, no response was given by the President. The Secretary of War, in his letter responding to the Senate resolution asking for "copies of correspondence relative to certain disorders in the State of Louisiana," omits to furnish a copy of this most material dispatch of September 18. Strange to say, every copy of the correspondence with General Emory is of later date than the 18th of September.

But we learn from this secret telegram of General Emory, first, that he received certain instructions four days after Kellogg's application to the President for protection; secondly, that those instructions were not revoked or changed as late as December 15, nearly three months from the day they were issued; thirdly, that General Emory, being in doubt as to whether they were "to be considered in force, or if he was to await the result of another application from Governor Kellogg to the President," asked the Adjutant-General to remove the doubt, and we know that if he was further or otherwise instructed, neither the President nor the Secretary of War reveals to us the fact. The only dispatch which can be considered a reply to General Emory's earnest request is to be found on the same page, (65.) General Emory made his first application on December 15. December 16 the Adjutant-General issues this order to him:

The President directs that you make arrangements to be in readiness to suppress violence, and have it understood that you will do it.

He says not a word about the instructions.

I have said that we are left to infer not only what these instructions of September 18 were, but how long they were to be obeyed by General Emory. But these questions admit of very little doubt. When we bear in mind that Kellogg made his application to the President for protection on the 14th of September; that the President responded and sent troops to him on the 15th; that he then issued certain instructions to the officer in command of those troops (General Emory) on the 18th; that no other instructions have been issued to that officer since that date; that that officer desired to know if he should wait for Kellogg to make another application in case of renewed violence; that Kellogg did not make any other application after the 14th of September; and that General Emory implicitly, and without questioning his authority, obeyed the order of Kellogg as governor, on the 4th of January, 1875, to unseat five members of a legislative assembly, no room is left for doubt as to the extent of the instructions issued to Emory. They were nothing less in effect than to march and countermarch, suppress or kill, as Kellogg might command. As to the length of time General Emory was thereby required to thus obey, there can be no doubt whatever. He must obey, of course, all military orders until they are revoked. They have never been revoked so far as we are informed, and they will stand, no doubt, until Congress by its action, or the people in their majestic moving, shall direct the President to release the State of Louisiana from her thralldom.

Let us hear no more that the President is not responsible for the overthrow of the reserved rights of the people of Louisiana. True, the President was not present nor did he order De Trobriand to march with bayonets fixed and loaded muskets into that sanctuary of the freemen of Louisiana, where arms are a dishonor to the American name; but he made that result not only probable but almost certain by giving over his baton to an adventurer, who, the President must have known, would use it with the recklessness of despair to hold an office gotten only by "gigantic fraud." The President did not strike the fatal blow, but, judged by the Constitution and the laws of the land, he is accessory before the fact.

But I pass from the report of Major Merrill and the dispatch of General Emory to another feature of this message and of the letter of the Secretary of War to the Senate.

There is a closet breathing in the instructions of the Secretary of War issued to General Sheridan which belongs not to the free, open spirit of a Republic. They are enveloped in the mystery which marks the movements of European diplomacy. They exhibit a distrust of the people. They are characterized by the secrecy by which armies are directed on hostile soil. They set the ruler at a distance far removed from and above the citizens. They, I am pained to say it, speak in the cautious undertone which bears to the keen ear of a spy the role he is to play in an enemy's camp. They are not American, they are not ingenuous, they are not indigenous to this land of freedom. They have an imperial tone, which Americans have never heard since they declared for independence. They open and begin with the word "confidential." The Secretary of War issued a secret order to General Sheridan on the 24th of December, 1874. After stating that the President had sent for him early in the morning to direct him to send the order, he continues:

Inclosed herewith is an order authorizing you to assume command of the Military Division of the South, or of any portion of that division, should you see proper to do so. It may be possible that circumstances may arise which would render this a proper course to pursue. You can, if you desire it, see General McDowell in Louisville, and make known to him confidentially the object of your trip; but this is not required of you. Communication with him by you is left entirely to your own judgment.

Of course you can take with you such gentlemen of your staff as you wish, and it is best that the trip should appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business, for the fact of your mere presence in the localities referred to will have, it is presumed, a beneficial effect.

The President thinks, and so do I, that a trip south might be agreeable to you, and that you might be able to obtain a good deal of information on the subject about which we desire to learn. You can make your return by Washington and make a verbal report, and also inform me from time to time of your views and conclusions.

Yours, truly, &c.,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

From this we learn that General McDowell was in command of the district embracing Louisiana; we know that General Emory was in immediate command of that State, and was on duty at his post. But the President passes them by, calls General Sheridan from his duties at Chicago, and, through the Secretary of War, orders him to proceed to New Orleans, and to let his "trip appear to be one as much of pleasure as of business." He is advised that it is left optional with him to inform General McDowell of the object of his trip; but should he inform McDowell, it must be done in the secrecy of confidence. "Communication with him by you is left entirely to your own judgment." He was permitted to take with him on this pleasure-business trip such gentlemen of his staff as he might wish. He was to find out the general condition of matters in New Orleans, returning from New Orleans to Chicago by the direct route of Washington City, and "make a verbal report" to the President of his observations as to what he might "deem best for the interests of the public service." He was to "assume command of the military division of the south," if "circumstances should arise which should render this a proper course to pursue." General Sheridan, appreciating the service as being profoundly secret, did not even let General McDowell have his confidence; and McDowell did not know until eleven days had elapsed, that General Sheridan had been sent into his military command on this secret service. The secret was not communicated to General Sherman, the General of the Army, until the order had been issued two days, and then it was made known to him in confidence. He acknowledged receipt of it in these remarks:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Saint Louis, Missouri, December 30, 1874.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your confidential communication of December 26, with inclosures.

Your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

General W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

But, sir, this is not all. The correspondence between the Secretary of War and the Army officers in Louisiana is cloaked and masked in cipher. More than one-half the dispatches thus sent and the answers thereto are secret.

A stranger to the transactions would at once conclude that Louisiana is a foreign power at war with the United States.

Major Merrill, fully impressed with the importance of his isolated command, when reporting that Lieutenant McDonald had been out with troops to assist Deputy Marshal Stockton in serving civil process, speaks of the movements of those troops as military "operations," as if he were commanding a force in the territory of a foreign country at war with us. And, sir, the whole tenor of these communications from the War Department and from the officers in Louisiana are full of evidence that the President and Secretary of War treat the people of Louisiana as public enemies. This secrecy cannot be explained on the supposition or charge that the citizens of that State feel unfriendly to the General Government. The evidence on this point is concurrent, overwhelming, and given by Federal officers. I take their statements from the documents furnished by the Secretary of War. And I cite them for a twofold purpose: to show, first, that there is no opposition to Federal authority in Louisiana, and therefore there can be no necessity for this mystery in the movements of the General Government; and, secondly, to show that the only opposition there is to the usurpation of Kellogg.

Arthur W. Allyn, captain Sixteenth Infantry, commanding at Colfax, where whites are called murderers and banditti, says:

Resistance to State troops is spoken of openly, should any be sent, but no disposition to oppose the United States troops appears.

Major Merrill reported to General Emory, November 28, that a bad state of affairs existed in the Upper Red River district; and General Emory sent Colonel H. A. Morrow to investigate and report.

The following report shows what is the treatment by the citizens of Louisiana of United States deputy marshals, and that Major Merrill's report of the condition of things on Red River is contradicted.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, Louisiana, November 28, 1874.

SIR: Major Merrill telegraphs that there is a bad state of affairs in the Upper Red River district; that negroes are murdered and otherwise ill treated, and asks additional force.

Persons from a portion of that district, some of them claiming to be republicans, represent a different state of things, and aver that any respectable deputy United States marshal can travel through that country and serve writs without opposition or without being molested. In some cases, too, it has come under my observation that officers new in the duties of aiding the United States marshal have not confined themselves strictly to the duties with which they are charged, and have, beyond doubt, been led into deviations from the line of duty, which, as I have stated in my annual report, was undefined, and which it was then earnestly asked should be defined.

Under the circumstances stated in the foregoing part of this letter, and to prevent further abuses, if any, and to guard against misrepresentation, and obtain all the facts in the case, I have concluded to send Lieutenant-Colonel H. A. Morrow, Thirteenth Infantry, an officer of judgment and discretion, into that district, with instructions, of which the inclosed paper is a copy.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel and Brevet Major-General, Commanding.

The ADJUTANT-GENERAL OF THE ARMY.
(Through headquarters Division of the South.)

Colonel Morrow went through the Red River district (Merrill's command) and made a "skeleton report," December 11, in which he says:

SIR: I cannot, for want of time, submit anything more at this moment than a skeleton report of my investigation here. It may be slow work getting down the river, and I say briefly, for the information of the department commander, that there is no need of more troops in this vicinity; and in this view of the situation Major Merrill entirely concurs.

An arrangement has been made between the United States civil authorities here and certain prominent citizens, under which it is more than probable that there will be no further calls for troops to act as a posse to marshals. If this shall follow from the arrangement referred to, the Army will be relieved from a most unpleasant and onerous duty, and a great cause of local irritation will be removed.

* * * * * * *

In all I have said it is important to understand that, so far as relates to the United States, there is not the slightest disposition to oppose the General Government, but the opposition to the State government is determined and expressed, and will manifest itself in open violence whenever and wherever it asserts itself.

Colonel Morrow made a full report (December 24) of his investigation. He says:

In relation to the necessity of sending more troops into that section of the State, I respectfully report that there is no need for more troops in any portion of Louisiana visited by me. * * * I mean to be understood as saying that troops will not be required at these points (Alexandria, Colfax, and Natchitoches) to compel obedience to any law of the United States.

He says again, (page 72:)

Respect and regard for the General Government are expressed by all classes of people, and so is the determination not to be, under any circumstances, brought into collision with the Federal troops.

Again Colonel Morrow reports (December 3) on the condition of these parishes:

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 3, 1874.

SIR: I have already reported verbally, and now by order report in writing, that I am of the opinion there was no necessity of the use of troops to aid the United States marshal in the service of the processes of the courts in the parishes of Lincoln, Ouachita, and Jackson, Louisiana. This opinion is based on the statements of respectable gentlemen of both the great political parties. A marshal discharging his duties in a gentlemanly manner does not, in my judgment, require the aid of the military.

Again, the House committee, consisting of Messrs. FOSTER, PHELPS, and POTTER, in their report (referring to Penn's overthrow of the Kellogg usurpation) say, (page 9:)

The movement was everywhere quietly accepted by the whites throughout the State until the Federal Government interfered, when Penn and his associates at once surrendered. * * * * * * *

The conservatives of Louisiana do not propose to fight the Federal Government.

Thus I have shown by Army officers who were sent into and through Louisiana to investigate the condition of affairs there, and by members of Congress who were sent to New Orleans to examine into the whole question, that the people of Louisiana have no thought of raising an arm against the authority of the Union.

But the conservatives of that State are charged with intimidating the blacks. Sir, the whites are the people who have been intimidated. Stockton, deputy of United States marshal S. B. Packard—two of the men the President relies on as disinterested witnesses in his indictment of the conservatives in Louisiana—has used every effort in his power to intimidate and harass that people, and that by virtue of his office. For this statement I rely on Army officers again and the republican members of Congress. Having some legal process to serve, Stockton made a requisition for troops as a posse before he attempted to serve the writ. Donald McIntosh, first lieutenant Seventh Cavalry, was sent with a squad of men to assist him. Stockton, on reaching Natchitoches, assumed such authority as will appear by the following correspondence. J. F. De Vargas, mayor of that town, addressed Lieutenant McDonald:

NATCHITOCHES, LOUISIANA, October 27, 1874.

SIR: I have been informed by Mr. J. B. Stockton, the deputy marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana, that he claimed the right to control the police regulations of the city, through the military force under your command, to disband any special police which I, in the exercise of my official duties, might employ, and arrest myself if he thought proper.

This statement of the deputy marshal, made to me, is of too grave moment to be passed over without bringing it to your notice; and as I cannot believe that this assumption of authority is warranted by any military orders or instructions, I feel justified in addressing to you this communication.

Lieutenant McDonald, in his report to the assistant adjutant-general, after saying that "The statements of the mayor are substantially true," proceeds—

Mr. Stockton gave me to understand that he had authority to displace the sheriff, parish judge, and other parish and city officers, and appoint others, in their stead. Besides this he had an exaggerated idea as to the extent of his authority as United States marshal. Had I concurred with him in his views on this point, (his authority,) and used the force under my command accordingly, instead of being here, the chances are I would now be swinging from a tree with a rope round my neck, or be a prisoner in one of the parish jails of Northern Louisiana.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DONALD McINTOSH,
First Lieutenant Seventh Cavalry, Commanding Company G.

The ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Headquarters Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, Louisiana.

Colonel Morrow, in his report already referred to, says, (page 72:)

The people reported, and seem to believe that the machinery of the Federal courts had been used to oppress them for political ends, and that the Federal troops has been used for political purposes. How far this has been the case I have no means of knowing, but I do believe that deputy United States marshals have used United States soldiers in cases where there was no necessity for them, and, from my investigations in the parishes of Ouachita and Lincoln, I am quite certain that these civil officers discharged their duties in an unnecessarily harsh, if not cruel manner. It was represented to me that the marshals are in the habit of prowling through the country in the night time, accompanied by a posse of soldiers, to make arrests of citizens who could be arrested by the marshal unaided, and under any circumstances should be arrested in the open daylight.

Thus we see, that doomed people are not only victims of a usurper as governor; of a Legislature put into power by military force, (though not elected;) of a corrupt returning board convicted of perjury by the House committee; of a judiciary so accommodating as to make two opposite decisions on the same question, but they are also oppressed by the civil as well as the military power of the United States.

But, sir, I must for want of time turn from this branch of the subject.

Let us now try to realize the condition of Louisiana. And, in depicting her forlorn state, I shall draw no fancy picture. I will let others tell the sad story, and I will call to the stand no democrat, no conservative, but let republicans and Army officers only speak. And first I will quote at length from the report of FOSTER and PHELPS, republicans of the House of Representatives:

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites since 1872 that the Kellogg government was a usurpation. This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg legislature abolishing existing courts and judges, and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; by changes in the laws, centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections; by the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office; by the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia, subject to the command of the governor; by the creation in some places of monopolies in markets, gas-making, water-works, and ferries, cleaning vaults and removing filth, and doing work as wharfingers; by the abolition of courts with elective judges, and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg, in evasion of the constitution of the State; by enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board; by unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks issued during the years 1870 and 1872; by laws declaring that no persons in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—measures which, when coupled with the extraordinary burdens of taxation, have served to vest, in the language of Governor Kellogg's counsel, "a degree of power in the governor of a State scarcely exercised by any sovereign in the world."

With this conviction is a general want of confidence in the integrity of the existing State and local officials; a want of confidence equally in their purposes and in their personnel, which is accompanied by the paralyzation of business and destruction of values. The most hopeful witness produced by the Kellogg party, while he declared that business was in a sounder condition than ever before, because there was less credit, has since declared that "there was no prosperity." The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25; of the city of New Orleans, from 80 or 90 to 30 or 40, while the fall in bank shares, railway shares, city and other corporate companies have, in a degree, corresponded. Throughout the rural districts of the State the negroes, reared in habits of reliance upon their masters for support, and in a community in which the members are always ready to divide the necessaries of life with each other, not regarding such action as very evil, and having immunity from punishment from the nature of the local officials, had come to filching and stealing fruit, vegetables, and poultry, so generally—as Bishop Wilmarth stated without contradiction from any source—that the raising of these articles had to be entirely abandoned, to the great distress of the white people, while within the parishes, as well as in New Orleans, the taxation had been carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation. In New Orleans the assessors are paid a commission for the amount assessed, and houses and stores are to be had there for the taxes. In Natchitoches the taxation reached about 8 per cent. of the assessed value on the property. In many parishes all the white republicans and all the office-holders belong to a single family. There are five of the Greens in office in Lincoln; there are seven of the Boults in office in Natchitoches. As the people saw taxation increase and prosperity diminish—as they grew poor while officials grew rich—they became naturally sore. That they love their rulers cannot be pretended.

The Kellogg government claims to have reduced taxation. This has been effected in part by establishing a board to fund the debt of the State at 60 per cent. of its face value. This measure aroused great hostility, not so much because of the reduction of its acknowledged debt, as because it gave to the funding board, whose powers seem to be absolute and without review, discretionary authority to admit to be funded some six millions of debt alleged to be fraudulent. So that, under the guise of reducing the acknowledged debt, it gave opportunity to swell the fraudulent debt against the State. This nominal reduction of the State taxes has been accompanied by a provision that the parish taxes shall not exceed the State. But the parishes have notwithstanding created liabilities; judgments being recovered on these, the courts have directed taxes to be levied for their payment, and thus the actual taxes have been carried far beyond the authorized rates. Rings have been formed in parishes, composed of the parish officers, their relatives, and sometimes of co-operating democrats, who would buy up these obligations, put them in judgments, and cause them to be enforced, to the great distress of the neighborhood, a distress so general that the sales of lands for taxes have become almost absolutely impossible.

But the reduction of wages, the non-fulfillment of personal or political pledges, the misfeasance of some local officials, disputes among the leading colored persons in other localities, the loss or embezzlement in some cases of the school funds, and the failure of the Freedman's Bank, all combined to divide the views of colored voters during the late campaign. An effort was accordingly made by the conservatives to acquire a part of the negro vote; with that view it was sought in many quarters to propitiate them. Frequent arrests by the United States marshals for intimidation or threats of non-employment, and the apprehension that was felt that the returning board would count out their men if excuse for such a course were offered, all combined, especially after the 14th of September, to put the conservatives on their good behavior, and the result was that in November, 1874 the people of the State of Louisiana did fairly have a free, peaceable, and full registration and election, in which a clear conservative majority was elected to the lower house of the Legislature, of which majority the conservatives were deprived by the unjust, illegal, and arbitrary action of the returning board.

Colonel Morrow, in his report, says:

Dissatisfaction and discontent are plainly visible in all the acts and conversation of the people, and the result is manifest in almost every department of business. Uncultivated fields, unrepaired fences, roofless and dilapidated dwellings, and abandoned houses meet the eye at every step, and the whole aspect of the country has a look of poverty and neglect. The schools in many parishes are closed for want of money to pay the teachers, and I was told again and again that the school funds had been stolen by the State officials. In one parish a criminal court had not been held in nearly two years, and in other parishes no court, criminal or civil, had been held for a long time. In a community where there are no courts crime finds a genial soil, and the natural result is that the law has fallen into disregard and disrepute. Judges were openly charged with corruption, and money, and not justice, is charged with turning the judicial scales.

The people reported, and seem to believe, that the machinery of the Federal courts had been used to oppress them for political ends, and that the Federal troops had been used for political purposes. How far this has been the case I have no means of knowing, but I do believe that deputy United States marshals have used United States soldiers in cases where there was no necessity for them, and, from my investigations, in the parishes of Ouachita and Lincoln, I am quite certain that these civil officers discharged their duties in an unnecessarily harsh, if not cruel, manner. It was represented to me that the marshals are in the habit of prowling through the country in the night-time, accompanied by a posse of soldiers, to make arrests of citizens who could be arrested by the marshal unaided, and, under any circumstances, should be arrested in the open daylight.

These night arrests seemed to have a peculiar terror for the people, and my attention was repeatedly called to them. Another subject of complaint was the fact that citizens are arrested without the shadow of a cause, and after long and vexatious delay and great expense, are set at liberty without affording them even a preliminary hearing. And another subject of bitter complaint, especially in Coushatta, is the fact that there is not a United States commissioner in the parish, and persons arrested are required to be sent to the city of New Orleans, several hundred miles distant, for even an examination. The expense of getting witnesses to so distant a point will make even justice a luxury that only the rich can procure. A man of moderate means could not hope to prove his innocence if the presence of many witnesses was required for the purpose. The people at Coushatta complained also, and I think justly, that a person had been sent there last fall as commissioner who was a brother to one and brother-in-law to another of the unfortunate men who were so brutally and dastardly murdered in August last. However brutal may have been the circumstance attending the massacre of these men, it will be at once conceded by every man at all familiar with rules in American and English courts, that a near relative of the persons murdered is not a proper person to sit as judge in even a preliminary hearing.

These were complaints made to me against United States officials, and I therefore report them for the information of the department commander. The complaints against the State officers were so numerous that a mere enumeration of them would fill a volume. Corruption and jobbing in office; partiality and favoritism in the administration of justice; exorbitant taxes, rising in some instances to 7 and 8 per cent. on the appraised value of the property; a ruined credit; a depleted State and parish treasury; enormous debts, State and parish; and multiplication of officers in the persons of favored individuals, are a few of the charges made by the people against their State authorities.

The political condition of the State is the one subject of conversation everywhere, in public and private, and among all classes, except the negro, who feels no interest in it, because he does not comprehend it. The dissatisfaction is widespread and deep, and I am firmly convinced that sooner or later there will be an outbreak of public feeling which will be attended by scenes of fearful violence. The determination to escape from the rule of the present State government is fixed in every mind, and, whenever the opportunity presents itself, a blow will be struck for the "liberation of Louisiana," to use the expression in common use. A combination or organization among the white men ramifies every parish and neighborhood, and there is perfect unanimity of sentiment, and will be concert of action whenever the time comes to take a decisive stand. Without going into needless details, I give the following as my deep-seated convictions: The present State government cannot maintain itself in power a single hour without the protection of Federal troops. I do not believe that the present State authorities, even with the protection of Federal troops, will be able to collect taxes and perform the functions of government after an early day in the new year. Opposition to them will be made at every turn, and every step they attempt to take will be beset with obstructions. Outside of New Orleans there is no party or organization in the State with sufficient strength or influence to afford the slightest aid.

The State government has not the confidence or respect of any portion of the community. I do not believe the Legislature, as organized under the recent action of the returning board, will be allowed to assemble, except under the protection of United States soldiers. Whether the reported action of the board is correct or not I am unable to say. If it is not, these remarks will have no force, as the contingency upon which they are based will not arise. I do not mean by this that the soldiers must necessarily be in force in the State-house, but the presence on the ground of a representative of the military power, with authority to declare in the name of the General Government that the Legislature will be under Federal protection; will be necessary to prevent in my judgment a terrible scene of disorder and perhaps bloodshed. I not only do not believe, but I am absolutely certain that there will not be at any time in Louisiana any organized or authorized resistance to the General Government. If the expressions of the people are to be believed, and I do believe them, there is a very sincere desire to live quietly under the protection of the Constitution of the United States and enjoy the blessings of the National Government. But there is no disguising the fact that the protection afforded by the Federal Administration to the government of the present State executive is the cause of bitter personal and political feeling in the breasts of nineteen-twentieths of the white inhabitants of the State.

I shall not be astonished if two Legislatures are organized in New Orleans on the 4th day of January next.

I have refrained from expressing opinions of my own on the causes which have brought the State of Louisiana to a condition of rebellion against its State government; but I do give it as my deliberate opinion that there will be open and organized forcible opposition to each and every act of the State government in a short time, unless Congress by appropriate legislation shall provide a means for the satisfactory settlement of affairs in this section of the Union. If Congress fails to legislate, a standing military force in almost every parish will be necessary to give protection to persons of the agents of the State executive; but a military force cannot compel people to pay taxes and do a thousand things necessary to good government; and I think, therefore, there is danger of the State organization coming to a standstill for want of necessary agents and machinery to keep it in motion. On every account, in my opinion, it is important that Congress should do something; and if there is any way by which the military department can bring the subject to the attention of that body it should be done.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HENRY A. MORROW,
Lieutenant-Colonel Thirteenth Infantry.

ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Department of the Gulf, New Orleans, Louisiana.

For the benefit of those who do not know this officer, I submit the following indorsement of General Sherman, commander of the Army, and of General Emory.

The latter, when transmitting the report of Colonel Morrow, from which I quote, says:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, December 27, 1874.
(Through Headquarters Division of the South.)

The report of Lieutenant-Colonel Morrow is respectfully forwarded.

This officer, who has heretofore been intrusted by the Government with important and delicate commands, was, by reason of his experience and the high confidence reposed in him, sent to make an inspection of the state of affairs in Northwestern Louisiana, as reported in a letter to adjutant-general, dated November 28, inclosing a copy of my instructions to him. I think it my duty to place the Government in possession of the facts stated and the views expressed by this officer.

W. H. EMORY,
Colonel and Brevet Major-General, Commanding.

General Sherman, in speaking of the report, says:

This paper is most respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War, with a request that he submit it for the personal perusal of the President. I know of no officer of Colonel Morrow's rank who is better qualified to speak and write of matters like this, and his opinions are entitled to great consideration.

Senator SHERMAN, in his speech made in the Senate during this debate, has given us the following picture of the condition of things in Louisiana:

They have to encounter another great difficulty in the novelty of former masters and slaves living together as freemen. This we know by all history is a most difficult problem. Those who were once slaves, whose wives and children were bartered and sold like sheep, are now citizens. The masters have been impoverished; they have lost their slaves; they have lost the use of their lands; all their labor is broken up. All these things are to be considered, and we must not overlook them. We must not therefore expect from them the same orderly regularity, the same freedom from violence and force, that we should expect in a stable, orderly people like the people of Ohio or New York. All the sources of wealth are dried up. When I was there last winter I conversed with gentlemen of all political parties, and saw the great change in the value of their property and the amount of their income. Some families had incomes dependent upon the rents of real estate in New Orleans, and the real estate would hardly pay the taxes, and they were reduced to poverty, hardly able to gather money enough to pay their taxes. All that creates acerbity and bitterness of feeling, and no one felt it more than I did at that time. Thoughtful men I say should give heed to all these discouragements and difficulties; but after all, considering them all, we have a right to ask of these people to respect the law, to be obedient to the law.

Such, Mr. President, is the picture of the condition of Louisiana as drawn in faintest colors by those whose interest and desire restrain them from exaggeration. And such is the fruit of reconstruction.

The republican party sowed the winds, and now they affect to stand appalled and rebuke the work of their own hands. They bound Prometheus on the rock, and when he writhes under the agony of the claws and beaks of vultures, they smite him for his convulsive struggle to be free. Hard as stone and cold as ice must be the heart which does not go out in sympathy for the people of Louisiana. In a land of boasted freedom she is in slavery; the slavery of intelligence to ignorance; of refinement to brutality; morality to crime. Fast as the wheels of time can bear her, she is speeding from the light of civilization into the night and darkness of barbarism. The blossoming garden is fading into a wilderness. A once noble race, with altars of worship neglected, is changing to a nomadic tribe who are followed only by tax-gatherers for money and marshals with military escorts to make arrests. And they are giving way to a race so inferior in intellect and moral sense, that they "feel no interest in the political condition, because they do not comprehend it."

Uncultivated fields, unrepaired fences, roofless and dilapidated dwellings and abandoned houses meet the eye at every step, and the whole aspect of the country has a look of poverty and neglect.

Schools in many parishes are closed for want of money to pay the teachers, because the State officials have stolen the funds "appropriated to education."

In one parish a criminal court has not been held in nearly two years, and in other parishes no court, criminal or civil, has been held for a long time.

Judges are openly charged with corruption, and money, and not justice, turns the judicial scales. Federal courts are believed to be used for political ends, and Federal troops for political purposes. United States marshals, backed by troops, arrest citizens at night and in a harsh if not cruel manner.

Kinsmen of persons killed are commissioned to sit in judgment on the accused. Bayonets uphold a usurpation which "without their protection could not maintain itself a single hour," because "nineteen-twentieths of the white inhabitants" cannot and will not acknowledge its power, and because it "has not the confidence or respect of any portion of the community." Taxes are levied as high as 8 per cent. of the appraised value, and the greed of assessors is stimulated by paying them a commission for the amount assessed," and taxation is "carried almost literally to the extent of confiscation," and "the distress is so general that the sales of land for taxes have become almost absolutely impossible."

Mr. President, this is the calamitous condition of things in Louisiana, and their existence is only evidence of the fact that the virtue and patriotism of the whole country are on the decline.

The whole body-politic is sorely diseased. Gangrene has seized upon one extremity and its deadly virus is spreading by natural circulation to the seat of life. If the malady of Louisiana be not cured, the Republic must die. Compression will not heal it and isolation is impossible. Already is the whole head sick and the whole heart faint. Rome began to decay in her extremities. The rapacity of satraps and pro-consuls on her remotest confines brought on revolts. The legions were sent to enforce civil law, and the work was done. But the eagles that spread their guardian wings over the tents of satraps and minions of power on the banks of the Euphrates, the Tagus, and the Rhine, to enforce civil law by force of arms, covered the hosts of Cæsar when he set his face against the capitol of Rome. The legions that yielded dumb obedience to the commands of the consul in the provinces, were his willing instruments when he planted his martial foot on the civil law. History repeats itself, and always will under the same conditions. The only unchanging quantity in the problem of human destiny is the moral nature of man. Ambition, pride, hate, revenge, lust of power are the same to-day they were when Adam fell. The Christian religion is the only restraint upon their mad career, and we to-day, with all our boasted civilization, are on the verge of a dreadful abyss. Rome as a republic withstood the shock of assaults from without and dissensions within for five hundred years. We, before the close of our first century, in the vigor of youth, are about to fall by our own hands.

History not only repeats itself, but it moves with striking coincidence.

I do not say that President Grant is a Cæsar, but his champions tell us, "history repeats itself." When Cæsar, the soldier, fixed his coveting eye on the coming empire, he first had himself elected consul. He was then chief magistrate and the commander of the army at the same time. "History repeats itself." He moved his army to the province of Gaul and subjugated it to his will. "History repeats itself;" and the inhabitants of Louisiana are the descendents of the Gauls of Rome, who were the first conquered subjects of imperial Cæsar. "History repeats itself;" and when Cæsar the dictator had established himself in the capital of the empire in fact, though in form and semblance it was still a republic, imperial Cæsar, the former soldier, who had led his legions in victory against the Gauls when they were in arms against the republic, addressed to the assembled senate and people these historic words:

> Let not these appearances of military force alarm you. The troops which are quartered in the city and which attend my person are destined to defend, not to oppress the citizens; and these troops I trust know, upon every occasion, the limits of their duty.

The President tells the people of Louisiana, "You must obey the law." Kellogg, with "damnable iteration," like a prating parrot, repeats, "obey the law," and Senators rise and say, the people of Louisiana must "obey the law." What law, Mr. President, are the people of Louisiana to obey? In 1872 they held an election, and by the report of your committee, the candidate of the conservatives had the majority, and yet, through the order of a drunken judge, the government of that State was overthrown, and the President said, "You must obey the law." Kellogg usurped the governorship of that State, and the President held him by force of arms and said to the people of Louisiana, "You must obey the law." I have shown you to-night that they have never resisted a law of the United States; they have raised no arm; they have not even raised their voice except against the usurpation of Kellogg. Their submission has been more sublime than any heroism that was ever displayed upon the field of battle. They have obeyed the law. They were encouraged and told last year they should have a fair and honest election. They obeyed the law and held their election peaceably and without intimidation, and it is conceded that the conservatives carried the State by an overwhelming majority. Kellogg organized his returning board. A majority of twenty-nine was overturned by that board, the Legislature was literally stolen from the democrats, and republicans defeated in the election were seated by Federal troops, and yet the President says, "You must obey the law."

The Senator from New York advises them to go to work. They were at work; but, says Bishop Wilmur, without contradiction, "theft of the products of the soil became so general the production had to be abandoned." They worked and filled their coffers with money to educate whites and blacks, and the State officials, guardians of these wards, stole the fund. The devotees of Bel, the heathen god, were required by their king to make offerings by day to satisfy the appetite of his idol at night, and his high priests entered by night and stole their offerings from the temple. So the people of Louisiana have been plundered and robbed by the guardians of law and order for six years past, and they are now mocked in their calamity by the advice to make more for the thieves to fatten on.

Were I called on to counsel that stricken and deserted people, I would appeal to them in behalf of themselves and their children, to bear for a brief time longer the ills they have; I would appeal to them in the name of liberty, and of forty million souls, to abide in patience the verdict of the people in the centennial year of our Republic. Their destiny is our own. If their thralldom shall not be broken, the prison walls must expand and embrace us all. We cannot live half free, half bondmen. The advice to them may seem cruel, it may be selfish, because they hold the destiny of us all in their hands; for the flame of revolution kindled there will spread to the confines of the Republic. I would beg them to believe that even their—

> Existence may be borne, and the deep root
> Of life and sufferance find its firm abode
> In bare and desolated bosoms; mute
> The camel bears its heaviest load,
> And the wolf dies in silence; not bestowed
> In vain should such example be; if they,
> Things of savage and ignoble mood,
> Endure and shrink not, we of nobler clay
> Can temper it to bear—it is but for a day.

Yes, sir; I believe as strongly as I believe in the progessive destiny of mankind, that the justice of the great American heart, like an angel of mercy, will go to the rescue of Louisiana on the morning of our centennial day, and will roll away the stone which now entombs her, and that she will rise and come forth to walk the earth again in full communion with her glorious sisterhood.

Texas Pacific Railroad.

SPEECH OF HON. E. D. STANDIFORD,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1875,

On the Texas Pacific Railroad and its relation to the industrial interests of the country.

Mr. STANDIFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Texas Pacific Railroad bill, to which I wish to call the attention of the House, is a subject of such vital interest to the country that I approach the discussion of it with a great deal of hesitation and reluctance, fearing that I shall not be able to do it the justice which I feel its importance demands or make my views fully comprehended. It is a question the correct solution of which will, I believe, do away with the complications now surrounding our financial affairs, and will restore our agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests to their normal condition of prosperity; nay, more, will give a stimulus to those interests which will start us on a course of prosperity which we have never before enjoyed. I deem it a question so materially affecting our industrial interests, that it becomes a duty for me to give my views as to how its adoption will be greatly beneficial to all classes.

I have carefully considered the question as to its effect upon the nation in an economical point of view as well as in reference to the financial condition of the Government and the present state of its Treasury, and I am forced to the conclusion that it is a measure to which we, as the Representatives of the people of the United States, should give our support. While it cannot be regarded in a sectional light, it is a measure which will go toward making up the balance of even-handed justice toward the South. It will show that we have something besides enforcement acts and military rule for that portion of our country, and demonstrate to them that we consider their commercial interests, and are willing to aid in bringing them out of their financial distress when we can do so consistently with the nation's ability.

It is a truth as well established as Holy Writ, that when the industries of one portion of our country are paralyzed the whole nation suffers, and I believe that the whole of our financial troubles can be traced to the exhausted and bankrupt condition of the States of the South. Before the war the South was the North's great market. Northern manufactories were constantly employed in producing their various articles for her consumption, and northern ships were tracking the ocean to procure those necessities or luxuries that could not be produced in this country, while on the other hand the fields of the South were taxed to their capacity to procure the wealth with which she paid you for the results of that labor and skill. The bone and sinew and brains of both sections were constantly and remuneratively employed, and the result was continued prosperity and growing wealth.

The war laid waste the fields of the South, destroyed her accumulated means, revolutionized her labor system, and at the same time destroyed the North's best market. Is it a wonder then that the country has suffered in its trade and been brought to the verge of bankruptcy? It is true that the crisis was postponed by the immense efforts which the capitalists of the North made to avert the pending crash which we all expected after the close of the war by large investments in the West and far Northwest, a region without a population and uncultivated, to substitute a western for the southern market. Had this effort been made to restore the South—a country filled with an intelligent and industrious people—our capitalists would not to-day be mourning over valueless stocks and bonds, which is all they have to represent their money invested in those northwestern securities.

You want an effectual reconstruction policy. Here is one for you; and I believe that no policy of statesmanship could do more to bind the two sections of the country together, for it will make them mutually dependent upon each other, and bring them into such a contact of mutual interest as will allay any feeling of unpleasantness or enmity that may now exist. It may be asked why do not the people of the South build this road themselves, if it is so necessary to them? I answer, they have no capitalists who are able to carry on this great work. The South before the war was an agricultural country, her surplus wealth had been invested in slaves; all this property was swept away at a single blow, and although it is a matter in which they all acquiesce and none of the former slaveholders would be willing to restore slavery, yet it was nevertheless a loss to the South of about $4,000,000,000 of capital, from which they have not been able to recover since the war. Consequently they must seek assistance elsewhere; and, bankrupt and overburdened by taxation, they ask this aid from the Government for the purpose of enabling them to rebuild their shattered fortunes.

I ask the men of the East to consider the fact that more than half of the exports which go out of this country and bring in foreign gold, upon which the Government depends to pay the debt and interest (for these must be paid out of the products of the soil which we export) is the product of the South; and by building this road these productions will be immensely increased and eastern merchants benefited, and their workingmen employed. The South is not only a large producer, but she is a large consumer. Her productions are mostly agricultural, such as tobacco and cotton and other staples, such as are to a great extent sold in foreign countries, while her articles of consumption are such as can largely be produced in this country. Hence it follows, that as she grows in wealth the demands for the manufactured articles of the East are correspondingly increased. This road, when completed, will build up the material interests of the South, and in this way, as in many others which I shall endeavor to show, revive the now stagnant commercial interests of the East and the whole country. Foreign capital will not seek investment except upon the assurance of a prompt payment of interest.

Our capitalists have already exhausted themselves in attempting to do that which they had not the means to fully carry out. There is little doubt that nearly every railroad enterprise which our financiers have aided would have paid them had there been enough capital to have carried it to completion. We have no capitalists in this country any ten or twenty of whom have the means to build this road; hence the necessity for Government assistance to secure the co-operation necessary to build this grand channel of trade which, to be a success, must unite the Atlantic to the Pacific. With the Government indorsement, these bonds will be readily purchased and the road speedily finished.

The country at large is suffering from a lack of the circulating medium. This is owing in a great measure to the enforced idleness of our mechanics and laborers. This bill, if it becomes a law, will put in circulation seventy or eighty million dollars which are now locked up at our money centers, or in other words it will inflate the currency to that extent without increasing its volume; the kind of inflation that will not reduce our credit and provides for the people to receive the benefit of the increase; the kind of inflation that the South and the West want and the East cannot object to. The unlocking of this large sum of money will restore confidence, and other capital will seek investment in other enterprises, until the whole of our locked-up currency will be distributed all over the land in active employment, and business activity and prosperity will be the result.

Let us consider the unpleasant fact that the country is not in as flourishing a condition to-day as it was one year ago, although we had then just passed through one of the most disastrous commercial panics ever experienced in the history of the nation, and which spread ruin and bankruptcy all over the land. We see property of all kinds continually falling in value, and gold, the measure of values, steadily increasing. The time has come for us to legislate in favor of the farmers and other producing classes. There has been too much legislation in favor of the bondholders and too little in favor of the farmer and mechanic, hence this unbalanced state of affairs in respect to property and money.

There are without doubt at this time one million mechanics and laborers out of employment in the United States. I do not take into consideration the naturally idle and vicious, but men who are anxious and willing and used to work; and that the country is suffering from the idleness of this vast amount of productive industry is a proposition that is apparent to every intelligent mind, for we all know that the country suffers when its industries are paralyzed. If you wish to see how serious this dearth of employment has become, look at the great State of Pennsylvania with all her wealth and intelligence and acknowledged industrial supremacy now just on the verge of a labor insurrection. Look where you will this depression is universal—factories, founderies, furnaces, workshops of all kinds, and workmen of all branches of trade, from one end of the country to the other, with nothing to do. It is hard to starve in a country like this; and I tell you that these mechanics will not starve without a struggle. They appeal and petition for employment; but beneath all that, sleeps a volcano ready to burst forth when milder means fail.

We have a remedy in this bill for all these evils, and why should we hesitate to pass it? Are gentlemen afraid that it will cost the Government something? Let them examine the facts and see what it will cost. I challenge any man to show how it will cost the United States anything. But supposing that it would cost something; would you as business men hesitate to invest a few thousand dollars when you were sure of a speedy return of a large profit—a fact which I shall presently show that this bill provides for the Government in case this road is built under this proposed act? Let it be announced that this transcontinental road is to be constructed at once, and the idle machinery of trade all over the land, from Maine to Florida, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, will start into active operation, confidence will be restored, and capital will seek investment. The employment of our mechanics will create a demand for the products of the soil and add a stimulant to our commercial interests; and in fact all classes will be benefited. And all for what? A simple act of Congress pledging the faith of the Government that the Texas Pacific Railroad Company will pay the interest on its bonds as it becomes due, and without the appropriation of a dollar in money.

I confess a selfish feeling in the advocacy of this bill, for I understand and fully appreciate the great benefit which this road will be to my own State, although not a foot of it passes within many miles of her territory. It will do more to promote her industries than any other measure that could be adopted. Her furnaces and mines and machinery, which are now idle, will be started into new life, new enterprises for the development of her resources organized, her laboring people employed, her counties burdened with heavy taxes for railroad purposes relieved by the renewed activity in railroad matters, a market will be furnished for her cattle, horses, mules, and agricultural productions, and industry and prosperity will go hand in hand. This picture is not of Kentucky alone, but of the whole South, and of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and in fact the whole country.

We have passed a bill promising to resume specie payments in 1879. Will we have the money to redeem this pledge? We certainly will not unless we do something to promote the industries of the country, to bring the balance of trade largely in our favor. When we can do this the question of specie payments is solved. This can only be accomplished by encouraging an increase of our surplus products and furnishing a market and means of transportation. It is simply folly to talk of paying our debts when the revenues of the country are constantly diminishing, until the President, in his message, and the Secretary of the Treasury, have thought themselves compelled to recommend an increase of taxation to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. What are the facts? The revenues of the Government are not equal to the expenditures, and instead of being able to provide for the payment of our demand debt of $400,000,000 in greenbacks we are called upon to furnish forty millions more to meet the interest and the deficit in the current expenses, and to increase taxation for that purpose. In my opinion, the present condition of affairs is not very favorable for paying gold for greenbacks when we see gold increasing in value every day.

But I do not propose to discuss the merits or demerits of the act providing for the resumption of specie payments. I leave it to the people to decide whether it was a wise or an unwise measure. My solution of the question is to pass this bill and let this road be completed, and the wealth which it will create will so increase the revenue and exports that taxes may be diminished instead of increased.

There is a very important fact to which I wish to call the attention of the House in this connection, and one which we ought carefully to consider in voting upon this bill, and that is our productive industry and skill have far outstripped the demands which we have for manufactured articles in this country. European governments have kept pace with us in this respect, profiting by our inventive skill so that they are able to supply their own people at prices with which we cannot compete. Where, then, can we look for a market but to Mexico and Asia? These countries, with their millions of people and low grade of mechanical skill, will and must be the customers for our surplus manufactured articles. And just here is a matter to which I wish to call the attention of the manufacturers of the North and East. Their warehouses are full of unsold articles, their doors are besieged by discharged mechanics asking employment, their machinery is idle because of the idleness of our thousands of workingmen all over the land.

The workingman is the great distributer of the money of the country, because he is one of the principal consumers as well as a producer. Give him work and he will supply his wants from his customers, who will in turn purchase of him. In addition to this the people of Mexico and Asia are in want of their productions. This road, if it is built, will give an easy, rapid, and cheap communication with these countries. These manufacturers have the advantage over England in reaching these countries of over three thousand miles of water transportation. Is not this a matter worthy of their careful consideration, I ask the representatives of these eastern manufacturers?

There is no question that has interested the country more than that of cheap transportation. I am fully persuaded that the Government can and ought to do no more to settle the question than to aid in bringing about a legitimate competition. The question of the cheapness of transportation depends, where there is competition, upon the distance from market. There is no system of carrying freight which can be adopted by which freight can be brought to any point for less than the actual cost of carrying it; and indeed no objection should be made to a reasonable profit. Competition will regulate the price and keep it within reasonable bounds. The true solution, then, of cheap transportation is to create rival routes and to lessen the distance to market. This the Texas Pacific road will do for the people of the South and Southwest by bringing them into direct and easy communication with Mexico and the commerce of the Pacific Coast, and at the same time will be of immense value to the people of the North and East by reduction of the tariff on freight and travel; while the West and Northwest, who are now loudly complaining that the present high rates amount to a practical embargo upon their industries, will reap the benefit not only of a reduction of rates but they will find that it will give them a market on the Pacific Coast as well as their present eastern market. This fact it would seem has been entirely overlooked by the representatives of this section of the country. It is not necessary, nor have I time, to discuss the details of how this will be brought about, a simple mention of the fact that the Pacific Coast is not adapted to raising the products of the middle west, and that beyond the coast the Asiatic states are calling for food and willing to pay for it, and between the demands of the East and the western coast there will be no fear of an overstocked market or that the labor of the farmer will be lost on account of a superabundant crop.

This road is one of peculiar promise and bears upon its face the elements of complete and immediate success. Passing through Texas, a State nearly as long settled as Pennsylvania, rich in all that supplies the wants of man, with a climate that changes its seasons only from spring to summer and from summer to spring again, with a soil of inexhaustible richness, producing all the cereals in the greatest abundance, as well as the finest cotton in the world, then on through mountains filled with the precious metals to the finest harbor on the Pacific Coast, beyond which lie China and Japan. It passes near the border of Mexico, which is just now awakening into new life, with her long-slumbering agricultural and mineral resources, and is ready to pour over this road into our lap the wealth of her mountains and plains.

The question is asked, are the people of the United States willing to be taxed to build this road? I say in answer that in my judgment they will not be taxed one cent, if we pass the bill, in consequence of this enterprise. The Government is not called upon to make a donation or pay out a dollar, but simply to indorse the bonds of the company to the extent of the interest, no more; and to secure it against any possible contingency of having to pay this, the United States will receive a first mortgage upon the railroad and all of its equipment, and be the custodian of the bonds, only to issue them as they are required to pay for labor, superintendence, and material, the company agreeing to pay the interest and principal as they each become due, which I am satisfied that it will be amply able to do. In addition to this security, which is ample, even superabundant, the Government will receive the absolute title to thirty million acres of land, which in ten or twenty years ought to be worth at least $60,000,000, and I believe will be worth $100,000,000, besides the increased revenue to be derived from the wealth which the building of this road would create.

Now as to the ability of the road to pay the interest as it becomes due. The Central Pacific road paid in earnings, as fast as it was completed, enough to pay the interest on the cost of construction. The Texas Pacific, passing through a finer region, more fertile in soil and salubrious in climate and more generally populated, cannot fail to pay largely in earnings as fast as it is built up. It will carry a population with it who will build up the country as it grows, to whom the road will be a necessity. Does any one suppose that our idle laboring men will permit the rich plains and valleys of Texas to remain uncultivated when communication and transportion are opened up? The Union and Central Pacific roads, a single line from Omaha to San Francisco, now pay in gross earnings about $25,000,000 a year, and in net earnings from thirteen to fourteen millions annually, or enough to pay the interest on a bonded debt of $280,000,000 at 5 per cent. Will any one say that the Texas Pacific road will not in view of these facts be able to pay the interest on a bonded debt not to exceed $100,000,000? I think I may safely say that the Texas Pacific will be more profitable than the Union and Central Pacific roads. But even if the Government were compelled to pay the whole of the interest upon these bonds, averaging say $40,000 a mile for nineteen hundred miles, making a bonded debt of $76,000,000, on which 5 per cent. is $3,800,000, it would be a profitable investment in the way of transportation of troops and supplies, besides settling the Indian question in this part of the country, which would save the Government many times the interest on these bonds.

This plan of aiding a railroad company is no untried one. England, which gentlemen will agree with me is the soundest financial government in the world, has adopted it and is continually putting it into practice in her colonial dependencies. One of her greatest sources of wealth is her East Indian possessions, and she has made it such by liberal aid to enterprises going to develop its resources, which are now, through these means, a source of endless and increasing profit to her and her people. Other European governments have followed her example, and are now reaping the benefit a hundredfold upon their investments.

Looking at this road as a matter of justice to the South in the comparative distribution of Government favors, it appears to me that opposition comes with bad grace from the North and the East who have received so much, and who are now, in comparison to the South, rich and prosperous in consequence. Can they not yield this much to us before we shut the national purse-strings altogether, if we must shut them to internal improvements. Illinois stands as a remarkable example of the beneficial effects of liberal aid bestowed by the Government when it was needed.

Her gifted and honored son, the late Stephen A. Douglas, who was cut down in the midst of his usefulness, a profound constitutional expounder and far-seeing statesman, in his early political career foresaw the advantage which timely and liberal aid to her railroads would be to his State. Using all the power and energy of his great mind he was able to accomplish much, and especially for her Central Railroad. By the immense grants of land which he obtained from the Government she was able to establish a net-work of roads all over her territory, and through these to make such gigantic strides in wealth and prosperity as in a few years to place herself in the foremost rank of States, while on the other hand the Government not only did not lose anything but is benefited by receiving from her about one-sixth of the entire internal revenue, amounting to more than fifteen millions annually; so, though badly treated in the instance of the aid given to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads, it is receiving a hundred times as much on account of its grants to the railroads of Illinois, a fact which is often forgotten in discussing the propriety of giving Government aid to internal improvements.

This State, which is enjoying these immense advantages growing out of Government aid to her in her time of need, has certainly no right to complain of the South and the Southwest receiving their share of the common fund to aid in building up their prosperity and in developing their resources, much less to refuse when we only ask an indorsement to become due on our paper and propose amply to secure the Government for this accommodation. But we find opposition coming from the metropolis of this State; and what is the cause of it? We see the Central and Union Pacific roads pouring the wealth of their immense traffic into Chicago's trade. We can only judge of the extent of this traffic from the amount of net earnings over and above expenses, which they report for 1873 to be $13,579,843 for the 1,900 miles, or more than the combined earnings of all the railroads in Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and South Carolina combined, with 13,908 miles of road, and nearly equaling the combined earnings of all the roads in the New England States with 5,303 miles. These figures are official, and can be found in Poor's Manual of Railroads for 1874. This gigantic monopoly the Texas Pacific Railroad will overthrow, and these immense profits will be taken away is the view that those interested in perpetuating the Union and Central Pacific monopoly take of the matter; hence their opposition to this or any other measure looking to the building of the Texas Pacific road.

But outside of those immediately connected with the Pacific roads

now built I think it a narrow-minded and short-sighted policy. While I admit that a large amount of the freight that goes over the Union and Central Pacific roads would be diverted and pass over the Texas Pacific; while New Orleans, Memphis, Vicksburgh, Atlanta, Charleston, Nashville, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, and other southern and eastern cities would share with Chicago the benefit of the present transcontinental traffic; and while the South and the Southwest would be immensely benefited by this division of the profit, yet ultimately the cities of the Northwest would be as greatly benefited by the increase of freight and travel naturally growing out of the reduction of rates and the increased prosperity of the whole country growing out of the building of this road.

I am glad to see any city and any section of the country growing in wealth, and am not here to cry down but to build up the prosperity of the nation; but when I see this contracted policy exhibited in behalf of any monopoly, I hold that it is for the interest of the country to point it out and oppose it. The net earnings of the railroads of Illinois are to-day more than $20,000,000 annually, or more than the net earnings of all the railroads in the Southern States combined or in all the New England States combined, and this is owing largely to the exclusive control of the trade of the Union and Central Pacific roads, which they have on account of their geographical position.

Looking at this measure for the aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad in any light, I cannot see how any person, and especially any person living in the South, can oppose it; and I would say to members from the South, if you wish to see your constituents as hewers of wood and drawers of water for C. P. Huntington and Jay Gould's monopoly, then vote in opposition to the Texas Pacific road. These railroad kings, renowned for sharp financial transactions, know well how to care for their own interests. They fully understand that the passage of this bill will take millions of dollars from them annually, and can well afford to pay out millions to defeat this measure, and are now moving every element of opposition in their power to accomplish that purpose. This they hope that they have already succeeded in, and are now endeavoring to gain control of the Pacific Mail, thus giving them a monopoly of the Asiatic trade as well as the exclusive transportation to the Pacific coast, while a cry of alarm comes up from the merchants of New York and the East for fear that they will succeed, knowing the character of the men who are in the lead and that their oppression will be merciless when their power is unrestrained. While some of these merchants are opposed to the building of the Texas Pacific, I predict that they will bless the day when it is completed and acknowledge the wisdom of the movement that carried it to success.

It is said in opposition to this bill that the Government has been defrauded out of its just dues by the Union and Central Pacific Railroads. It is true that when the Pacific road was in contemplation it was regarded as a scheme of such gigantic magnitude as to forbid its ever being put into practical operation. Even Thomas Benton, whose clear-headed statesmanship and practical common sense in other things was recognized and honored throughout the nation, was considered visionary in advocating the idea of a railroad uniting the Atlantic to the Pacific. The Rockies and Sierra Nevadas, interrupting with their lofty peaks and mountain walls, stood as barriers deemed impossible to surmount, and the so-called great American desert, covered with the skeletons of men and animals who had perished in attempting to cross its fearful wastes, was an obstacle of equal if not greater difficulty. The dangers to be encountered and the difficulties in the way were always exaggerated, and these exaggerations were willingly credited because they accorded with the traditional belief of the American people. And when at last it was determined, simply as an experiment, to build the road, it is no wonder that Congress thought it must be liberal to secure a route so necessary to the country and so fearfully difficult to construct. They were simply deceived as to the natural obstacles to the proposed route. It is true that some of them went over the line before it was built; but the superficial observations of an inexperienced person would not detect the natural advantages which would be discovered by the scientific eye and unerring instruments of a practical engineer, and a little divergence from the line of the proposed route would, while not being observed, deceive the eye of science itself. Men who were willing to undertake to penetrate the rocky fastnesses of those mountain ranges and brave the sickly atmosphere of those arid deserts and the savage hostility of the Indian tribes were regarded as nothing less than heroes and scarcely less than martyrs to the cause of civilization and national advancement.

Congress believed and had reason to believe what was told to it in reference to what the road would cost, and was even accused of niggardly parsimony by many who thought it was giving too little to successfully carry out so stupendous an undertaking; and if Congress and the American people were deceived, it was through the mendacity and fraud of their trusted agents. No one has any right to say that this or any other Congress will be led or bribed into defrauding the Treasury; because such an assertion would reflect not only upon Congress, but upon the integrity of the people, of whom his constituents form a portion. Is there a gentleman on this floor who would say himself or willingly permit another to say that his constituents would return a dishonest man to this House? The danger is not that the people and the Government will be cheated by our acts, but that they will be defrauded by the loss of measures both necessary and patriotic for fear that charges of bribery and corruption will be made.

The people and Congress know now what is required to build a road to the Pacific coast as accurately as what it will cost to build a road from Washington to New York. The "rugged Rocky range" and the snow-capped Sierras have been accurately measured by the theodolite and chain, and the romantically dangerous passage of these mountains, as was formerly considered, has been reduced to a mathematical certainty. There are no more imaginary perils. All the difficulties are accurately known and have been scientifically described. The amount of excavation and fill, the amount of grading and labor, the number of ties and tons of rails and timbers for bridges, and in fact the entire expense is accurately computed of this road which shall cross the magnificent plains of Texas—a country the painter's and poet's ideal, with its romantic legends and historical associations, with its landscape scenes unrivaled in beauty and in form, and its agricultural resources unsurpassed in the whole world—over mountains whose magnificent scenery surpasses the Alps, and at last shall join the Atlantic to the Pacific by iron bands through a region whose climate forbids that it will ever be blockaded by snow or made uninhabitable by cold.

But, says some one, this is an appropriation for Thomas Scott, as though such a puerile assertion was an argument against this bill. It is not an appropriation of any kind. It is true that Colonel Scott is at the head of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. Who would you have at the head of the road to make it a success? Some man who is inexperienced in railroad affairs, or the man who from the humblest position of poverty in boyhood has risen by the genius of his strength, activity, and brains to the highest position known to the American people outside of their immediate gift? The man who has built and controls thousands of miles of railroad and gives employment to thousands of men all over the country, and who has done more to develop and increase the wealth of the country than any other man in the United States? I am not speaking in fulsome praise of any one, but for justice against idle disparagement and libelous sneers.

To have avoided these frauds of the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies Congress should have thrown sufficient safeguards around the expenditure of the aid furnished in their construction, and should so have enacted as to have prevented the loss of the lien which the United States had upon the property of these roads; but this was not the first time and only way in which the Government has been defrauded. Is there any one who denies the necessity of these roads and immense value they are and have been to the country and the people? And who would do away with them, even if the Government could be placed in the same position in respect to finances that it was before they were built?

Does the fact of this particular loss to the Government teach us the lesson that we should not aid in any other enterprises to develop our incalculable resources? I say not. It teaches us the lesson of carefulness, and that we should throw such safeguards around the use of the aids which we may hereafter give to internal improvements as will prevent their being diverted from their proper channels to any other use. This, if gentlemen will carefully examine, they will see that this bill does. There is no opportunity for Credit Mobiliers or contract and finance companies in it. We have learned wisdom by experience; and if this bill is made a law, it will restore to the United States, in my judgment, as much or more than it has lost in money in aiding other roads. But the Union and Central Pacific roads are able and can be made to pay every dollar that they owe to the Government, as I have shown in the fact that their net earnings are sufficient to pay the interest on a bonded debt of $280,000,000, when the roads did not cost more than $130,000,000; and under proper management the United States will sustain no loss.

But, Mr. Speaker, waiving the great advantage which this bill will be to the collective industrial interests of the country; waiving the question of the beneficial effect which building this road will have upon the laboring masses; waiving the immense benefit which the road will be to the South and Southwest, and the incalculable profit which it will be to the merchants and manufacturers of the East by breaking down the greatest monopoly in this country, if not in the civilized world, as a financial proposition in which the interest of the Government alone is involved we should pass this bill. It only asks the Government to indorse the bonds of the company to the amount of the interest, no more, which will not exceed in any event $3,800,000 per year. The Government will be the custodian of the bonds until the road is built, and will issue them from time to time to pay for construction. It will save more annually than it is required to guarantee in the matter of transportation of troops and supplies and in the protection of the frontier, and besides it will receive thirty million acres of land, which, when the road is built, will be worth at least $60,000,000 and probably $100,000,000.

I am tired of hearing this bill spoken of as a party measure, because such is not the case. It is a measure in which the people of the whole country of every party are equally interested. I hold to the precepts, principles, and traditions of the democratic party, knowing it to be the party whose support rests upon the letter and spirit of the Constitution; I believe it to be the party of progress, in whose hands American enterprise and progressiveness will be fostered and maintained, and at the same time the Constitution will be revered and obeyed.

But I regret to say that there are some gentlemen of the party to which I belong who, while agreeing that this is a great and needed enterprise, and one that will build up the South and the Southwest, will give employment to our laboring classes, avert the necessity of increased taxation, and restore business to activity and life, much to my surprise claim to have constitutional objections to voting for this bill and giving Government aid to this company. I can see no constitutional obstacles in the way, and there is nothing in the Constitution that prevents making it a law. On the contrary, as a matter of public policy in the present state of financial distress, we should pass it at once.

It will be no excuse for gentlemen to go to their constituents and say that they did not vote to add an additional tax upon the household expenses of every family in the country. If this additional tax is levied, it will be to meet the expenses of the Government made necessary by a deficit in the revenue, and add a further burden of $40,000,000 without giving any additional strength to bear it. The people will not be satisfied with this passive conduct of their Representatives. What they want is live, active, energetic work and progressive legislation to develop our resources and stimulate our industries. Men are not sent here because they are not likely to do any hurt, but that they may be active in doing that which is useful and for the good of the Republic and the business interests of the people. If there are constitutional objections to the passage of this bill, we have always been and are continually violating the Constitution by our laws and appropriations in aid of commerce.

The Constitution was never intended to be a clog upon the progress of the age, but was made for all ages to direct our legislation in the true course of advancement, until we shall become the mightiest and most prosperous nation on the face of the earth. I do not believe, as some profess to, that the Government is wholly protective in its character; I do not believe that its mission is simply negative and altogether to prevent injuries and injustice. These are its prime objects, but there is a progressive side, through which may be carried out those enterprises which are for the greatest good of the greatest number.

I do not believe in a paternal government, but I do believe that it is the duty of the Government to aid in those vast and necessary enterprises which can only be accomplished by the united action of the whole people. This bill is an act of justice to the South and Southwest; and when they ask for the same assistance which has been meted out to the East and the Northwest, they ask for an act of simple justice; they demand it as a matter of moral right.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that when we see every artery of industry in the country stagnant, all our commercial interests on the brink of bankruptcy, all the money in the country locked up in vaults at our money centers for the want of confidence, labor unemployed and thousands of our mechanics on the point of starvation, the President and Secretary of the Treasury urging upon Congress a large increase of taxation, to add to the weight already resting upon our overburdened tax-payers and made necessary to meet the expenses of the Government on account of the failure of the revenue from the causes which I have enumerated—I say when we see all these, and when we have a measure like this, which has in it so many elements of good to the country, we ought to give it our most careful consideration; and if, as I have attempted to show, its adoption will relieve depression in business, start our paralyzed industries into new life, give employment to our laboring classes, unlock capital, restore confidence, avert the necessity of increased taxation, and build up the South, we would not be doing our duty to our constituents and the country if we do not give this aid to the Texas Pacific Railroad.

The Atlantic and Pacific and the Texas Pacific Railroads.

SPEECH OF HON. ERASTUS WELLS,

OF MISSOURI.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1875,

On the bill (H. R. 4547) granting aid to the Atlantic and Pacific and the Texas Pacific Railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, since I have been a member of this body no measure has been presented which has had more powerful claims upon Congress for support, on the score of justice and equity, than the bill to grant aid to the Atlantic and Pacific and Texas Pacific Railroad, and coupled with the eminent equities and justice of the measure, all the best interests of the whole country unite in demanding the construction of this road at the earliest practicable day.

I take it that no fair and honest man will deny that, if the Southern States had been represented in the Congress of the United States at the time the Union and Central Pacific roads were located, they could not have been placed where they are. The sentiment of the country had long before been expressed in favor of a great central Pacific road, and no one can honestly claim that said roads are located centrally with reference to the great interests of the country in any respect.

In 1849 my city, through its city council, called a national convention to consider this very subject. This convention was held in the city of Saint Louis in the fall of 1849, and was presided over by the lamented patriot and statesman, Stephen A. Douglas. The best talent of the nation was there represented, and Missouri's great Senator, Thomas H. Benton, was among the number in that convention and addressed it. The country well remembers his untiring efforts in favor of a grand national central railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean. The representatives of Pennsylvania took a prominent part in that convention. After an elaborate discussion of the subject in the convention, and upon the conclusion of one of the ablest and most eloquent speeches on the subject that was ever made, by the then Representative in Congress from the Terre Haute district of Indiana, Richard W. Thompson, he offered the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention it is the duty of the General Government to provide, at an early day, for the construction of a central national railway from the valley of the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this convention a grand trunk railroad, with branches to Saint Louis, Memphis, and Chicago, would be such a central national one.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to communicate to the convention to be held at Memphis the foregoing resolutions, and to request the concurrence of said convention therein.

Following the holding of the Saint Louis convention, in the fall of 1849, a convention on the same subject was held at Memphis, which, in an elaborate report, indorsed the Saint Louis resolutions; and following the convention in Memphis one was held in Philadelphia, which took similar grounds. I state these facts to show to the country that, if there was anything settled in public sentiment, it was that the road from the Mississippi River to the Pacific coast should be located so as to be central. No one will claim that the Union Pacific road location meets what was the expressed will of a united people. All honest men must admit that the North seized upon the opportunity of the absence of the southern Representatives from Congress to fix upon a location that was sectional, and not central and national. I do not complain of this particularly, I only name the fact; for when the locations of the present roads were made they were not certain that the union of States would be preserved, and in that event, to the Northern States the Union Pacific would not have had so sectional a location. But the point I would make is this: Will the North hold on to an advantage thus obtained, and refuse to grant to the Southern and Middle States equal advantages for the Pacific trade which she obtained under the circumstances just stated? Can the North afford to be arraigned before the country upon a question presenting her in so unjust a light to her sister States? Will the Northern States claim advantages obtained from the public Treasury that they are unwilling to grant to the Middle and Southern States? I hardly believe any people can long sustain themselves in so unjust an attitude.

Just here, sir, I shall read the recommendation of the committee in charge of the bill as to the route of the proposed road:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That authority is hereby granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to construct its line of road from its present western terminus at Vinita, southwestwardly, by the most practicable route, so as to intersect with the line of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, as hereinafter set forth; and the Texas and Pacific Railway Company is hereby authorized to construct its line from Fort Worth, so that a connection can be made with the road of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, at some convenient point to be agreed upon, not farther north than the thirty-third parallel of latitude, and not farther west than the one hundred and third degree of longitude; and from such point westwardly to the Rio Grande, and to San Diego Bay on the Pacific coast, through Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California; and, for these purposes, the said Texas and Pacific Railway and Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Companies, respectively, shall have and enjoy all the rights, powers, privileges, benefits, and immunities heretofore granted by, or acquired under, the several acts to which this act is supplementary, except that the grant of land shall not be duplicated, and shall not exceed twenty alternate sections per mile in the Territories and ten alternate sections per mile in the States on each side of the lines of road.

The right of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to construct its line shall be held to have lapsed, except so far as the same may be required to perfect the line authorized to be constructed or perfected under the provisions of this act, whenever the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a survey and location of its line southwestwardly from Vinita to an intersection, as aforesaid, with the line of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company.

I claim, sir, that the North should lead in this measure of justice to the Middle and Southern States. They should come forward and say that they did obtain an unjust advantage while the Southern States were unrepresented, but that they are unwilling to hold it, and rejoice in the opportunity of showing to the South that they cannot only be just but magnanimous. They can well afford to do so, for while they will be doing an act of simple justice to the South, they will at the same time be subserving their own best interests and those of the whole country, by instituting a wholesome competition that will reduce passage and freight rates between all the States and the Pacific coast one-half, and will save in this way to the country many millions of dollars annually, and far more than the interest on the bonds, which is all we are asked to become liable for, to secure the building of this road, which is to be of such incalculable benefit to the whole country, and especially to the Southern and Middle States, and which is so eminently their due upon every consideration. Too long have we suffered from this injustice already, and the North cannot afford longer to deny us so just and equitable a right.

The provisions of the bill are clear, specific, and definite that in no event can the Government be the loser of a dollar in granting the aid asked for, the indorsement of the interest only, with ample security that the money will be furnished by the company to meet the same, being the only assistance required. I shall read what the committee recommends on this point:

The simple facts are that on a large portion of the line to be constructed the issue of the company's bonds is confined to $35,000 per mile of 5 per cent. bonds, making $1,750 per mile per annum for interest, while on another large portion of the line the issue is confined to $30,000 per mile, requiring but $1,500 per mile of net earnings to take care of the interest. I think if any unprejudiced man, or any man at all familiar with railway matters, will take up the subject and consider the great agricultural resources of Texas, her production of cattle, her mineral wealth, and her present large population, and follow the line through to the Pacific coast, with its rich belts of precious metals, coal, iron, copper, and lead, and the large traffic it will receive from the border States of Old Mexico, and then compare all these with the country now traversed by the Union and Central Pacific roads, he will say that these resources are largely beyond what existed on the present line. And yet we find that the existing roads have developed and are now enjoying a business amounting to about $11,000 per mile of gross earnings; that their working expenses are less than 50 per cent., and, what is still more remarkable, that the local business of the lines, all of which has been created since their construction, amounts to over 70 per cent. of the entire gross receipts; or, in round numbers, about $8,000 per mile, from local traffic alone, which, allowing 50 per cent. for cost of working, leaves a profit of $4,000 per mile to be applied to the various classes of indebtedness, leaving out of the question entirely the profit on their through business.

All that we require, to thoroughly and fully protect the Government from ever being called upon to pay a dollar is a gross earning of not exceeding $5,000 per mile, which, making an allowance of 60 per cent. for working expenses, leaves an ample fund to take care of every possible liability that the Government may incur.

I think, from these simple but strong facts, that it should be clear to every mind that the work, as constructed, will not only have the capacity to make the earnings referred to, but largely to exceed them, thus giving to the Government the use of these highways without money, making these large economies for her Departments without cost, going a long way to settle the border, and especially the Indian troubles, and, in connection with these things, starting into active life the business of the country, which has never been so depressed as it is to-day.

The theory of the bill, in the first place, is to secure the construction of one southern line in place of two, as previously provided for, on the thirty-second and thirty-fifth parallels. Large grants of land have been made for each, but have not been available, and now it is the purpose to abandon one of the grants of land and make one united road in place of two. So that it is of consequence to the Government to secure the return of large portions of the lands that have been granted. Now, when this line is completed, it not only reaches the roads mentioned to New Orleans and Vicksburgh, but the Atlantic and Pacific furnishes a road from Saint Louis to the great central portion of the country.

I think it will be much better, because the combined line will run near the northern part of Mexico, and bring to this country an immense trade from that region. Now, under this bill, it is to be remembered that the Congress of the United States does not give its bonds; that these bonds are the bonds of the company, secured by a first mortgage upon all its property and franchises, and that it is simply the interest on these bonds that is to be guaranteed. I have heard it stated as an objection that Congress released, in the case of the Union Pacific, the first lien that it had, and may release this lien. You will see at once that this is impossible, because it is not the obligation of the Government, but of the company, secured by a first mortgage, that cannot be divested under any circumstances, the bonds being in the hands of third parties, who have invested their money in them.

This road, too, runs at a great distance from the other lines of road, and cannot fail to earn the money to pay the interest. There can be no risk on the part of the Government; there can be no loss; you can hardly find a way in which there could be loss.

Nor is this a mere experiment. The matter has been tested in various countries of Europe for many years. Great Britain has indorsed the interest on bonds to the amount of six hundred millions of dollars to build roads in India, to deprive this country of the monopoly of the cotton production, and no one ever heard of her losing anything from it. France has pursued the same system, and also Belgium, and these governments do not lose money; and Russia has guaranteed a much larger amount of railroad securities than any of the countries named.

Now, if the United States can aid in building this main thoroughfare, and secure all the advantages adverted to here, and can do it without risk to the country at this time, when almost all railroad securities are so greatly depressed by reason of the panic, and make these bonds good at a low rate of interest, thus securing the construction of these roads at so cheap a rate, because the reason that railroads cost so much money is the high interest they have to pay, discounts, commissions, &c., and with the interest guaranteed as proposed on these bonds, the money could be had at par and the roads built cheaply and well, I think it would be an excellent thing for the Government to do. How is it possible that the Government could lose? How can Congress hesitate to aid the construction of a road of so much importance to the country, when it could not possibly injure the country?

With a line provided to New Orleans, and through to Vicksburgh, every interest of the country will be enabled to connect with this road and the region it will traverse, as it will then form connections to every important city on the Atlantic seaboard, and at the same time form connections to Chicago, Saint Louis, and all the interior cities of the country by existing lines. On the Pacific coast it will form communications with every interest that is now constructed there, through which an interchange of commodities between both sides of the continent can be made with great facility and greatly to the advantage of the public.

It will be found that it is provided in the bill that no more bonds are to be given to the company than will suffice to cover the expense of constructing the road:

SEC. 3 * * * That it shall be the duty of the commissioners appointed by the President to certify to the actual expenditure of the moneys required for the purpose of constructing and equipping the lines up to the Government standarde as required by law; and all bonds of the company secured under the mortgage, over and above the amount actually required as above, shall remain in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not be issued except to provide additional facilities, after the completion of the road, to meet the requirements of the public, as set forth in this act.

SEC. 4. That the delivery of bonds to either company, as provided in this act, shall, ipso facto, constitute a first lien or mortgage upon the respective lines of road and telegraph upon which such bonds shall be issued, with the rolling-stock, depots, shops, fixtures, and property of every kind appertaining thereto, including the franchises of said companies connected therewith, and all the lands granted by the United States in aid thereof, or the net cash proceeds of the sale of such lands, and so much of the net earnings of said companies, respectively, as may be required to provide for the interest, and for a sinking-fund, as provided in this act; and it shall be the duty of each company, respectively, upon accepting this act, to file a mortgage with the Secretary of the Interior, duly executed under its corporate seal, to secure the said bonds and the interest guaranteed by the United States.

I can well understand, sir, why it is that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads should have their secret and open agents at the capital to fight this measure and misrepresent it. They want no competition. They want no other road that will reduce rates, or that will afford to the country a route for travel and traffic superior to their own. They do not desire to see a road built through a section of the country where snow-drifts and snow-storms are unknown; where snow-plows and snow-sheds will not be needed; where wearied and hungry passengers shall not be detained among mountain gorges or on desert plains, exposed to the biting blasts of the Sierra Nevada. In their mind's eye they foresee the immense advantages which the country at large must inevitably derive from a road built in great part through a section unrivaled for the fertility of its soil and the salubrity of its climate. They appreciate but too well the advantages they possess in their transcontinental monopoly, and will not let go their grip without a struggle.

We all know, sir, that at this day, and ever since the Union Pacific was built, it compels all business to pay exorbitant rates over its road, and this in defiance of the act of Congress under which the road was built, and in contravention of the laws we have passed to enforce its obedience in pro-rating with the Kansas-Pacific road. In the bill of the committee which I am now advocating, the most ample security is given against the violation of law or of right such as I complain of.

It seems almost superfluous for me to consume time in enumerating all the great advantages the construction of this road will give to the country. These have been so well and so ably presented in the memorials from the chambers of commerce and boards of trade of my own and other cities, that I will not attempt to enumerate them. The National Grange, which has but recently closed its session at Charleston, has expressed the sentiment and wishes of the farming classes of all sections of the country, by the adoption of resolutions strongly recommending the measures proposed in the bill of the committee. The legislatures of many of the States have likewise echoed the sentiments of their constituents in recommending this all-important measure.

To all the magnificent results, speedily or ultimately to flow from the completion of this route, must be added another of more immediate and vital necessity—the prompt stimulus which, by granting the aid desired, Government would give to great branches of industry. It is something that a few thousands, out of the great multitude of laborers now idle, would be employed at once in grading and cutting ties for these roads. But of the four hundred thousand tons of iron needed for their completion and equipment, every pound must come from American furnaces; more than a million tons of ore and two millions tons of coal must be taken from our mines; thousands of men must be employed in working the iron into rails and spikes, wheels and locomotives, and thousands more in the car-factories. These roads will soon be necessary. Can there be a time when this great stimulus would be more grateful to disheartened industry? As soon as the completion of the main line is assured, other roads will also be pushed to effect connections with it, and each will add to the demand for labor, and for the products of our mines and manufactories.

The locomotive is the great civilizer of the age. Wherever its iron footsteps tread, industry keeps pace. Its cheery voice dispels ignorance and superstition. The pathway of this mighty Hercules is strewn with the ruins of barbarism, bigotry, and idolatry. No missionary more eloquent, more persuasive, or more potent than the locomotive. Not to be profane, his voice is that of, "one crying in the wilderness, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight his paths.'" And the valleys that he fills and the mountains that he makes low, are they not recorded in innumerable reports? Send him on a mission along the line proposed in this bill, and my word for it, that so soon as his journey is accomplished, Indian raids and murders will be unheard of. Start him across from Memphis to Mexico, and the desert in his pathway will become as a garden, full of "beauty and bounty."

Mr. Speaker, I have perhaps spoken too long in advocacy of the bill of the committee, and delayed others abler and better qualified than myself from speaking of its merits. But I could not, in justice to myself, to my people, and to the country at large, have said less in commendation of a measure which should commend itself to the good opinion of all right-thinking men. The bill has been carefully prepared and guarded, so as to protect the interests of the Government. We know that it asks nothing of the Government; simply that the Government will go security that it will pay interest on the funds needed to build the road; and if it should not, the Government has the first and only lien for this interest; not the second, as in the case of the Union and Central Pacific, where it is bound for both the principal and interest.

We know that the passage of this act will give work to many idle men; that it will start the fires of now extinct furnaces; and that its benefits to the industrial and all classes will be greater than any language I could use would enumerate.

For these reasons, and for many others that might be presented, I trust that this bill will become a law.

Civil Rights.

SPEECH OF HON. T. F. BAYARD,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

February 26, 1875.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights—

Mr. BAYARD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The measure now before the Senate has been here upon other occasions in a different form from that in which it is now presented. On those occasions those with whom I act politically in this body signified at great length their reasons of opposition. These objections were, however, made before the Supreme Court of the United States had passed upon the question of congressional power which is involved in the measure which I now propose to consider. The invalidity of acts like this, the utter absence of power in the Congress of the United States to assume jurisdiction over the internal affairs of the States, was then charged by the minority in both Houses of Congress, and was demonstrated over and over again in argument, but as usual without avail. The opposition to this bill, Mr. President, will be useless to prevent its passage, but I can speak with confidence of the fate which I believe this bill will meet at the hands of an intelligent and independent judiciary. I do not believe there is a section or a provision in this bill which is in accord with the meaning and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States; and this Congress, in attempting to enact such measures into law, are assuming powers which a proper regard for the oath they have taken should prevent.

Mr. President, we have here a most high-sounding title; an act proposing nothing less than "to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights." It would seem in a breath to constitute an entire scheme of government, and the preamble following this title is quite as magniloquent and in keeping:

Whereas it is essential to just government we recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political; and it being the appropriate object of legislation to enact great fundamental principles into law: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c.—

What is this act,
That roars so loud, and thunders in the index?

Why, Mr. President, it would require the voice of a trumpet to give full, sonorous justice to such swollen phrases. If we had been told the preamble came from the hand of Mr. Joseph Surface, that celebrated master of fine sentiment, I should have thought the production well worthy of the author.

But, Mr. President, are we thus to proceed to enact, like any other "friends of humanity," great fundamental principles into law without regard to the character and extent of the powers delegated to us as legislators and the limitations placed by our own oaths in accepting the Constitution as our guide in framing laws?

Now, sir, under what clause of the Constitution are we to find power for this proposition? We are told that the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution gives us warrant. What does it provide? In section 1—and it is in the first section alone that this power is suggested—we find that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Here in the first sentence is a simple declaration of the citizenship of persons within the United States; and as we all know, the effect of that declaration has been not to give any new rights, privileges, and immunities, but simply to enlarge the class of those who were to be entitled to "the privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States.

The second section of the fourth article of the original Constitution provided—

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

There had been prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment a denial to certain classes, owing to alleged disabilities, to be considered citizens of the United States, although they might be citizens of some particular State. The Constitution, as amended, provided that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

There we find a simple declaration, and thus far no grant of power other than had existed prior to that time. Further—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I apprehend that it is in this language which inhibits any "State" from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States that warrant for the bill we are now considering is supposed by its advoctes to be found. The second section of this fourteenth article merely provides for the apportionment of representation and punishes the refusal to allow representation for persons who are disfranchised. The third section prohibits any person having taken up arms against the United States and being engaged in insurrection or rebellion from holding an office under the United States or under a State except that disability be removed by a vote of two-thirds of Congress. The fourth section provides for the inviolability of the public debt of the United States and prevents the possible payment of any debt of a government engaged in hostility to the United States. All therefore that we find is that if there be any warrant whatever for this measure in the Constitution it must be found in the second paragraph of the first section which forbids any State from abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States and inhibits any State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.
